In the home of an English country pastor, his boy of ten lay at the point of death. To double their sorrow, the father had that very afternoon a preaching engagement of much importance several miles distant. Can he go, and never again, possibly, see his darling boy in life? "Most certainly not!" decided the whole family. "But I will go!" was the splendid response of God's devoted servant; "it is my Master's business; weeping must not hinder sowing." Accordingly, the trusty horse was saddled, and, having pressed upon the little sufferer's thin, pale cheeks the very tenderest of kisses, he calmly rode off. About midway, however, Mr. Philip Henry felt a sudden impulse—he could not possibly overcome it—to stop and dismount. Next minute he did so. Then, throwing the bridle over a fence-post, down he knelt by the quiet roadside, entreating the Great and Good Physician to speak the word only and to heal his beloved child, sparing him for much usefulness in his Church on earth, but saying also, in full resignation: "Thy will be done." Towards evening, on returning home, ere he had time even to ask, "How is Matthew?" a beaming face welcomed him at the gate, and a glad voice cried: "Taken the turn! Recovering!" So, in life as well as death, what we consecrate to God he gives back to us. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth." And withholding from God either our money or ourselves tendeth to poverty.

Ruth's loveliness is not dimmed as she goes forth into the harvest field as the family breadwinner, to glean after the reapers among the sheaves. By a wise law the poor who could not find employment as reapers, might gather up whatever grain the reapers left behind. This is probably all that Naomi and Ruth had to live upon.

THANKSGIVING IN OLD NEW YORK

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

LONG before New York bore its English name, it was worthily christened New Amsterdam by the brave Dutch colonists who were its earliest settlers. In 1613, the vast cosmopolitan city now known as Greater New York had for its nucleus four little houses, occupied by people whose business it was to collect beaver and otter skins and sell them to traders from Holland, whose ships had dared the wide ocean in search of profitable ventures. At that period, Holland led the world in commerce and the Dutch, then as now, were distinguished for shrewdness, sagacity, enterprise and an unconquerable love of liberty. The word "Dutch" signifies folk or people, and contains, strangely enough, a prophecy of the cosmopolitan character of the town that in 1614 was named New Amsterdam. In 1644 New Amsterdam was taken by the English and re-named New York.

Archbishop Fenelon said long ago of New York: "When one beholds this city, one is inclined to believe that it is not the city of a particular people, but the common city of all the peoples of the world, and the centre of their commerce."

New York itself is a collection of cities, as it were, merged into one, under a single government. It is cosmopolitan, and the stamp of its character was given it away back in the early days of New Amsterdam. A stone's throw from those residential parts of the city that are the chosen abodes of wealth and fashion we find crowded quarters where the older inhabitants speak foreign tongues, and the children only are familiar enough with English to use it in preference to the language of their parents. There are French, Swedish, Danish, Finnish, Italian, German and Hungarian quarters in the great city of New York, and more and more in recent years has it become sought by an immense and steadily increasing reinforcement of Hebrews, who find here a refuge from the persecutions of centuries, and a place where their peculiar commercial genius may find room for expansion. The beneficent agency of the public schools, more than any other, brings to bear upon the children of the foreign population the spirit of American liberty and trains them in the elements of good citizenship and in ardent love for the flag of the republic.

One is sometimes tempted to wonder what Father Knickerbocker would think, could he visit to-day the city of Peter Stuyvesant. Fancy the ghosts of the people in our picture trying to find the localities with which they were once familiar. Few traces linger in the New York of the twentieth century of New Amsterdam in the seventeenth. The hurrying, bustling crowds, the hurling forward of the motor-cars like the rush of meteors fiercely projected through space, the demoniac clang of electric cars, the never-ceasing ebb and flow of pedestrians, and more than all else, the towering structures twelve, fourteen, sixteen, twenty stories high and more, would amaze any visitant who left the earth when New Amsterdam was a little trading village.

Imagine such a ghost in the neighborhood of the Flatiron Building. It might feel more at home on the Battery, but Broadway, through its entire length, would prove a bewildering spectacle. What would a matron or maiden of the leisurely ways and generous hospitality of that quaint period think of modern apartment buildings, rich beyond compare in their appointments, but often stinted for air and sunlight, where families live in successive layers of brick and stone, like the cells in a vast hive, and where a guest-chamber or any provision for entertaining friends has become traditional? Maiden Lane was once the favorite haunt of young people in love, and many a troth-plight was exchanged there. The Bowery was a place of gardens and farmsteads. The most rapid growth of the city, however, and its almost miraculous changes, have taken place in the last hundred years. Instead of bridges spanning the East River, a century ago people crossed in row boats, and as for tunnels beneath the rivers and underground railways, they were not thought of in the wildest dreams of those who lived in New York so late as 1807.

Certain characteristics bestowed upon the town by the Dutch are still ineffaceable. The city is fearless, friendly and far-sighted. It plans always for the future. It still keeps Thanksgiving, Christmas and the New Year very much as those days were kept by the fathers and founders. In the picture, one sees minstrels going from door to door, singing to the praise of Almighty God, while their friends step over the threshold to join the song and give them a hearty welcome. Perhaps we may call the little processions of children dressing in queer costumes and gaily masquerading, processions we are sure to see in New York at Thanksgiving, the historic sequence of the prettier custom of long ago.

OLD-TIME MINSTRELS IN NEW AMSTERDAM

Thanksgiving, wherever it has been kept in America from the time of its introduction by distant New Englanders, has been not only an occasion when we recognize what we owe to Almighty God, but as well a time of good cheer and abounding hospitality. Kith-folk hasten from far and near that they may sit together at the family board on Thanksgiving Day. Parents and children, grandparents, uncles, aunts and cousins and members of the clan to the remotest degree unite in the celebration of this peculiarly American festival. Father Knickerbocker again, and any of the immediate circle of the Pilgrim Fathers, would be horrified beyond measure could they observe the absence from church on Thanksgiving Day of younger people who have seized upon this holiday as especially appropriate to outdoor games. College foot ball interferes not a little with the mid-day dinner once universal. Notwithstanding this, which we may hope is transitional, our churches are open and goodly congregations assemble to listen to patriotic addresses from the lips of eloquent clergymen, and to sing with heartiest devotion, "My Country, 'tis of Thee." House parties fly from the city to the country to spend Thanksgiving, but they seldom lose the distinction of belonging primarily to kith and kin.

The life of the Dutch in Manhattan was full of homely joy. Domestic fidelity was the rule and there was a great deal of wholesome hilarity around the fireside. The ladies were fond of rich dress and wore it on state occasions, as did their good men. Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, in her beautiful story, The Bow of Orange Ribbon, has painted a realistic picture of social life in old New York. The book is of perennial attractiveness.

In this year of grace shall we not find that the list of mercies sent to us straight from God is by no means short? We thank God for health and strength, for honest work and honest wages, for free homes and open churches, for good government, for the love of kindred, for the smile on the face of the mother and the clinging hands of the little child. Also for the son who reaches his manhood and the babe who laughs in the cradle we offer thanks to our Father in Heaven.

When the barn and bern are safe, when [illegible]
When far and near the [illegible]
harvest's gold,
When cloisters rich have dressed their [illegible]
And general orchards, wide and free, [illegible]

Then up from grateful hearts let joyful [illegible]

PRETTY HOME-MADE GIFTS

Metal Work, a Pleasant and Remunerative Occupation

By FLORENCE C. FEATHERSTONE

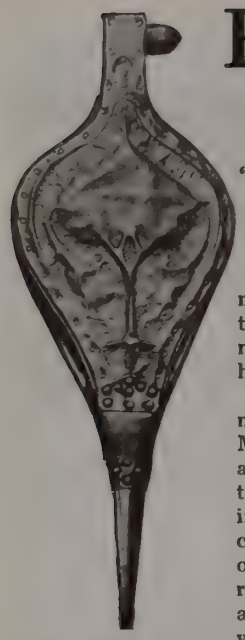

Fig. 1. An Artistic Bellows

"MECHANISM has destroyed the debit of intelligent, personal effort on the part of the worker, and his energies are now directed to the imitation of the cold and arid regularity of the machine," says Viollet le Duc in his work on medieval metal work.

The revival of interest in craftsmanship is due to Ruskin and Morris. They both gave critical attention to the crafts, and through them it came to be seen that it is impossible to detach design from craft. Design in the past was the outcome of work. It is true with regard to every kind of decorative art, that the hand-made has a high value and peculiar merit of its own.

From Umbria in Italy are imported silver bangles and bracelets, which were made in the interior with only a nail and a stone for a hammer. They are eagerly purchased by tourists. One author of several books on jewelry and metal work, who is one of the greatest connoisseurs, claims that the coarse metal ornaments made by the Italian peasants have a far greater value, because they are artistic and characteristic, than the most elaborate machine-made articles found in the fashionable shops of Paris.

In England, Belgium, Germany and France efforts are being made to revive the art of metal-working, and workers of real merit are encouraged to become producers on a large scale. It is the aim of this article to put artistic craftsmanship before the people as furnishing an interesting and lucrative occupation for those who would gain a livelihood.

The photographs on this page show what can be done with a piece of metal, a hammer, the handle of an old bone tooth-brush, a common nail sharpened to a conical point, a pair of scissors, and a few sheets of blotting paper or a piece of felt. Procure a tooth-brush handle with an oval end, like the end of your thumb, round on one side. With a piece of glass or a sharp knife, scrape it down on one side only to about a sixteenth of an inch.

Fig. 2. A Paul Revere Lantern

By holding this tool upright you can make a groove the same width, and by going over the line again and again a wider line will be obtained. Now, if you will take a piece of the thinnest brass or copper, about 30 gauge, you will find it so soft and pliable that you can draw or indent a pattern on it with a wooden stick or even with the point of the finger. If your sheet of metal is backed by some substance, like a pad of blotting paper or a piece of felt, which only yields to hard pressure, the ease with which it may be decorated is evident. Of course, the thinner the metal the easier the work; but having once indented a pattern on thin metal you can do it quite as easily, on second trial, on metal of a heavier gauge.

The thickness of metals is known as their gauge; the gauge or thickness decreases as the numbers increase. From 30 to 26 gauge is about the right thickness for beginners, as it is light enough to cut with scissors. Brass comes in rolls of different widths, from a fraction of an inch to 24 inches wide. It may be bought by the pound and retails for twenty-five cents. Copper is about the same price, though this may be had in large sheets, as well as in rolls. With this simple equipment any girl can, in her own home, with a little ingenuity, make any number of useful articles, which not only have artistic merit, but commercial value as well. The writer knows of one energetic, industrious girl suddenly left to her own resources, who is doing this work as a means of livelihood. She does it in a hall bedroom in a boarding-house. She makes a specialty of small articles, such as finger plates, escutcheons, corners for boxes and blotting pads, frames, book ends, candle shades, buckles, trays, sconces, candlesticks, ornamental pan-covers, etc.

The hammer should be light, strong and flexible—flexible to allow of great variation in the force of the blow, and strong so that the shaft will not break when a heavy blow may be necessary. By holding this mallet near its head a light blow is obtained, and by holding near the end of the handle a heavy blow results. Do not attempt to force the tool down rigidly. The feeling is that the hammer never leaves the tool more than a quarter of an inch, so rapid is the movement. The tool should not be held tightly in the fingers, but firmly down toward the metal, the hand resting upon the work, the wrist acting as a vibratory centre.

For your initial effort try to make a blotter corner. Cut a square of 28 gauge brass—this will make two corners 6x6—and attach this to a board on which there are several sheets of thick blotting paper. Transfer the design by using black carbon paper. This mark, however, is readily rubbed off, so it is best to scratch the lines in with your nail-hammer. Pierce the outlines in a series of regularly placed dots, then gradually fill in the background.

Always work from the centre outward. If you work on one side of the pattern at a time, while there is no indentation on the other, your metal will buckle. From scraps of metal you can make any number of attractive corners for books; decorative hinges, too, are easily made and look well mounted over covers of velvet, satin or tapestry. For these small articles, which may be made of the thinnest metal, decoration by a series of dots is admirable. More skill is required to trace a design in lines than to follow the lines with a series of single dots. In this case, the work must be done from the back and care taken not to pierce the metal. The nail for such work should be filed to a smooth blunt point. By having a number of different sized points much variety may be given to the work. For instance, with a small tool make a dot as a centre, around this make with a much larger tool five dots, or bosses, as they are called, and you have a conventionalized forget-me-not.

Sheet metal cut out and mounted on colored silk, leather or velvet gives charming effect. This idea was first suggested to us by an exquisite marriage chest made in the fourteenth century and now in the Correr Museum in Venice. In the Middle Ages the practice of covering wooden coffers with thin metal either cut or embossed was very general. Many fine examples of this work are to be seen in American and European museums. It is advisable for those interested in this art to visit our own museums and see the beautiful trinkets and utensils made by our primitive people and the Indians with the most rudimentary tools. Study the best models and familiarize yourself with the romantic history of this art. No doubt you have heard of the doors overlaid with brass of Homeric palaces, of Queen Helen's gown adorned with plaques of beaten gold, and of the chest of hammered metal in which Cypselus was concealed.

Fig. 4. A Candle Sconce

Uncivilized people of prehistoric times employed a rude method of enriching metal utensils, by decorating them with hammer and punches or nails. Examples from the South Sea Islands show these ornaments punctured on the face of the article, resulting in a variety of chasing. In Greek examples, the punching is on the back showing raised dots on the front.

Metal work should especially appeal to the woman with a home. The sooner she realizes that a little time and a little endeavor mean more than money in the making of a pretty home, the more artistic domicile there will be. The woman of wealth, too, often spends well but not wisely.

This pair of bellows (Fig. 1) cost in the natural wood sixty cents. It was then covered with thin brass. Brass head tacks were added to the edges where the leather strips were held on by ordinary tin tacks. This materially improved its appearance.

Instead of puncturing the metal, this background is worked down by using the oval side of the tool, made of your tooth-brush handle. With its edge carefully outline the forms first, then gently and gradually work the background in.

These bellows sell readily for five dollars; the Paul Revere lantern, Fig. 2, for six and eight dollars according to size. The material for these cost about thirty cents, and you may have to pay a tinsmith seventy-five cents for making them up.

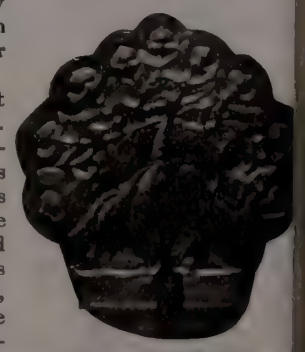

Fig. 5. A Peacock Sconce

This clearly shows that there is profit in the work. At the exchanges for women's work, two dollars is asked for blotter corners in sets of four, and five for the sconces, Figs. 5 and 6. Small candle shades are two and a half a pair, and lamp shades range from ten to twenty dollars, according to size.

The Procession of the Eras

IN a recent address, President Roosevelt, describing the world's march of civilization, delivered the following strong and eloquent passage which is worth remembering:

"Our place as a nation is and must be with the nations that have left indelibly their impress on the centuries. Men will tell you that the great expanding nations of antiquity have passed away. So they have; and so have all others. Those that did not expand passed away and left not so much as a memory behind them. The Roman expanded, the Roman passed away; but the Roman has left the print of his law, of his language, of his masterful ability in administration, deep in the world's history, deeply imprinted in the character of the races that came after him. I ask that this people rise level to the greatness of its opportunities.

"The Mediterranean era declined with the Roman Empire and died with the discovery of America. The Atlantic era is now at the height of its development and must soon exhaust the resources at its command. The Pacific era, destined to be the greatest of all, and to bring the whole human race at last into one great comity of nations, is just at the dawn. Man, in his migrations westward, has at last traversed the whole round of the planet, and the sons of the newest West now stand on the Pacific coast of America and touch hands across the greatest of oceans with those ancient races of Asia which have from time immemorial dwelt in their present seats. It is the fate of the American people to be placed at the front in the turmoil that must accompany this new placing of the peoples. I believe the contest will be friendly and peaceful; it surely will be if we keep ourselves so strong that we do not have to fear wrong, and at the same time scrupulously respect the rights and feelings of others. Our aim must be to bring all nations into intimate and brotherly association."

Thanksgiving AT THE Bowery Mission

THIS week, with the Thanksgiving celebration, the winter's work at the Bowery Mission really begins. At one o'clock on Thanksgiving morning, the bread-line will form outside the Mission doors and a thousand hungry men pass through the basement. At the first table they receive a cup, and from a great wooden box filled full, two rolls. Passing along, they fill their cups from a barrel of coffee, boiling and kept hot by a steam pipe passing through it. Eating and drinking as they walk, they deposit the empty cups and leave by another door.

By keeping them moving, the multitude can be fed, and although provision is always made for a thousand, and more than that have been given food, yet at times many have to be turned away. On Saturdays and Sundays the crowd is usually less, for some have friends, who share with them their week's wages.

The bread-line lasts from Thanksgiving to Easter. In the summertime, this floating population in the great cities is reduced. Some tramp away to the country, where the conditions of life are not so difficult and the chances for employment increase; but with the approaching winter they are drawn back to the city, as though some irresistible force attracted them to the very place in which it was hardest to live, most difficult to conquer circumstances.

In this problem of the unemployed, the Free Labor Bureau of the Mission is of great assistance, finding work for hundreds of men every year, much of it in the country, or in smaller places where men are needed. In these latter cases, the Mission pays part or the whole of the transportation.

As usual, the platform of the Bowery Mission will be covered with hundreds of Thanksgiving baskets this year. Each one will contain more than enough for a family's dinner. Mr. John Long, who makes and executes all the plans for lunches and dinners, has a long list of good things for this year—chicken, tea and coffee, potatoes and bread. Many a mother will have occasion to remember her trip to the Mission longer even than Thanksgiving day. "Only one meal," some might say, "and they will be as hungry as ever." But as in the case of the feeding of the men, it is more than the food itself that helps these unfortunates; it is the thought that lies back of it, the generosity and helpfulness, the idea that there is some one who cares.

Thanksgiving will be a busy day with the bread-line in the early morning, and the distributing of the baskets in the forenoon to the women and children who have received tickets which entitle them to take away a prize. Then there will be the free dinner to the men at noon and the usual services in the evening.

Fortunate Americans, seated in affluence among their loved ones, will not forget the poverty-stricken and friendless. The men and boys who crowd the Bowery Mission on Thanksgiving Day need to have set before them a ray of light, a doorway of hope. On the rugged road, every Christian puts out the hand of brotherhood to the one just below him. Thus is God's love reflected through his children.

Gospel Triumphs in India

ONE of the most cheering letters lately received from India is that printed below, which comes from a well-known missionary of many years' experience in the field. He writes:

"We are face to face with a serious problem in Ellore. I think I mentioned in one of my letters that we were hoping the high caste people would soon be coming to Christ. The break among them has, I rejoice to say, begun, and some have already given themselves to the Lord. Two have been baptized; three more are ready for baptism—including a Brahman—and three more caste people and two Brahman families are seeking Christ.

"There can be no doubt that God is going to let us see great things, and that we are on the eve of a break among the high caste people such as I have not seen or heard of during my twenty-five years in India. Glory to God!

"Caste converts, on being baptized, become outcasts and cannot stay in their homes. Provision will have to be made for these people until employment can be found them, or if they know no industry they are taught one. A Converts' Home here is an absolute necessity, and the upkeep of such a home will mean no small expense till some industry can be got under way.

"What a break among the caste Hindus will mean we can scarcely imagine. The fact of a number of this class becoming Spirit-filled workers and preaching to their own folk and among the low caste people would mean almost unthought-of blessing and victory.

"The work all around is being greatly blessed. Fifty-four people were baptized last month, and many more are coming to Christ.

A. S. PAYNTER."

A Newly-Created Volcanic Mountain

THREE months ago the discovery was made by United States revenue officers that an island with a double peak had risen in Bering Sea in a single night, off the coast of Unalaska. Its dimensions were about 1,700 feet by 3,000 feet, and the peaks were nearly 400 feet high. Steam was still issuing from many crevices, and no one could land upon the hot and smoking rock. A dense cloud of steam and smoke hung over the craggy island. Some two months later one of the peaks subsided and the profile of the other was greatly altered. Lava had issued from some central crater in immense quantities, and was deposited over the entire island. There was a strong deposit of sulphur. The nearest volcano is Mount Makushin, on Unalaska Island, over fifty miles away. Scientists are still undecided as to the origin of the new island, which may at any time disappear as mysteriously and suddenly as it came into view.

Heart Throbs is a fascinating book, full of unexpected pleasure. Turning the pages is just like turning a corner and finding an old friend at every turn.

Heart Throbs is the mother of all scrap books. It is a book that, like Topsy, "just growed." Every sketch and anecdote it contains was immortal to the sender because of its personal application to his own experiences. It comforts and soothes in sorrow, it mellows with pathos, it sparkles with wit and humor. No matter where your eye strikes the page, there you find the verse or sketch somebody thought was the best thing they ever saw in print.

Heart Throbs has excited the most curious and absorbing interest, because it is the only book in the world that is the work of 50,000 people united together in compiling something that should stand as representative of the heart-ideals of the twentieth century.

Heart Throbs is a collection of scraps in prose and verse—the pathetic or humorous little things that have appealed to people as they sat at the fireside reading newspaper, book or magazine. President Roosevelt furnished his favorite selection. Hundreds of other prominent public men are numbered among the 50,000 contributors. Its chief value, perhaps, lies in the insight it affords into the tastes and aims of "the plain people of America," as Lincoln loved to call us.

Many of the selections were yellow with age, taken from mother's scrap book, sacred with hallowed memories; some came from between the leaves of the family Bible or the old school-book in the attic; many clippings were worn threadbare and carefully repaired and strengthened; odorous with lavender, rose and orris, proving that the American people hold dear the sweet, tender sentiments associated with home and mother.

And more remarkable still is the fact that in the consensus of their opinion there are but 840 "prime favorites" in all literature, down to the present, that can truly be said to have lived in the heart of the people. What are they? Is one your favorite? These questions the book answers for itself.

It is indeed rare to find a book of such radiating personality. It is more than a book, for the printed page, under the magic of memory, seems transformed into a mirror in which is reflected the scenes and incidents of a happy childhood. Somebody kept that clipping to renew his youth, and in contributing it to Heart Throbs he "hangs a picture on memory's walls" that you may enjoy it with him.

You'll never grow tired of Heart Throbs because it wears—because it is made of the literature that endures. Every mother loves Heart Throbs, for within its 400 pages are the heart-to-heart sentiments—the favorite selections of thousands of mothers, beautifully expressed, which put aside the cares of daily trials and proclaims the majesty of motherhood. Every father finds in Heart Throbs a keen delight in the jovial jokes, while he philosophizes on the kernels of human nature found in the selections sent in by thousands of fathers, like himself. And so it is all down the line.

Heart Throbs has a gripping, thrilling interest for brother, sister, son, daughter, aunt, uncle, friend, lover, sweetheart. Every teacher should have a copy for the schoolroom; every preacher for the pulpit; every boy or girl for the nobleness and optimism it teaches; every "good old soul" for the memories it brings—a universal book with a range of emotion greater than Shakespeare.

Questions and Answers

M. R. H., Hill City, Kan. Does the Bible anywhere claim to be a guide through life?

That is its general claim. It would be easy to cite hundreds of passages. The most direct perhaps are those in Psalm 19. There are more in Psalm 119. In verse 105, the poet says explicitly, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light to my path." In the New Testament there is the familiar statement of the Apostle Paul (II. Tim. 3: 15) referring to the uses of Scripture.

J. B., Rahway, N. J. What is the general situation to-day in the various States with regard to temperance? In other words, what proportion of the country is "dry"?

At the last election, the temperance question was an important factor in a majority of the States. Approximately, the present situation is as follows: Texas, 145 counties dry; Nebraska, 400 towns dry; Kansas, dry throughout; North Dakota, all dry; South Dakota, one-fourth dry; Oklahoma and Indian Territory, dry; Washington, 50 towns dry; Oregon, 12 counties dry; Minnesota, 123 towns dry; Iowa, 65 counties dry; Missouri, 44 counties dry; Arkansas, 58 counties dry; Louisiana, two-thirds of State dry; Mississippi, almost wholly dry; Alabama, three-fourths dry; Georgia, all dry after January 1 next; Florida, 34 counties dry; South Carolina, 17 counties dry; North Carolina, 99 per cent. dry; Virginia, 72 counties dry; West Virginia, 30 counties dry; Ohio, 68 per cent. dry; Indiana, 680 towns dry; Illinois, 600 towns dry; Wisconsin, 708 towns dry; Michigan, 50 towns dry; New York, 602 towns dry; Pennsylvania, 1 county dry; Rhode Island, 16 towns dry; Massachusetts, 250 towns dry; Connecticut, 96 counties dry; New Hampshire, 176 towns dry; Vermont, 112 towns dry; Maine, all dry; Delaware, 50 per cent. dry; Kentucky, 97 counties dry; Tennessee, almost all dry; other States, results uncertain, but temperance made large gains everywhere.

R. O'D., Memphis, Tenn. What is a "Jack-Mormon"? I came across the phrase in a magazine lately, but can find no explanation.

The Idaho Scimitar, which seems to be well informed, gives this definition in a recent issue:

A Jack-Mormon is one who has no convictions and consequently no courage. He lives among the Mormons and understands them. He sustains them in their evil practices and makes excuses for them in public. In nearly every instance he denounces them bitterly in private conversation with Gentiles, if he thinks the Mormons will not hear of it. He hopes for political favors at their hands. He is engaged in business and fears he will lose a few dollars if he expresses himself. He is equally craven and sycophantic with Gentiles and Mormons, and is held in contempt by both.

A. R. G., Burlington, Ia. What is the meaning of the number of the beast in Rev. 13: 18?

The Greek or Roman or Arabic letters have each a numerical value, as the letters on the face of a watch, or as we write MCMVII for 1907. John is believed to intimate that the numerical value of the letters of the name of this man would, if added together, amount to 666. You will find the number in Ludovicus. It is also in the title Vicarius Filii Dei. It is believed on other grounds to relate to a person, not to the Pope or any other office or organization or church.

W. A., Mendham, N. J. What was the relation of Hobab to Moses? Was he his father-in-law, as stated in Judges 4: 11, or his brother-in-law, as stated in Num. 10: 29?

The relationship is uncertain. The phrase in Numbers, "Moses' father-in-law," may refer to Hobab or Raguel. The probable explanation is that Hobab was the brother-in-law, or perhaps he married a sister of Moses' wife. The latter seems more likely to have been the case, as in Judges he is called a Kenite, whereas Reuel was a Midianite. Another reason for regarding him as a brother-in-law is that apparently he remained with Israel, as implied in Num. 10: 29, while Moses' father-in-law is represented (Ex. 18: 27) as departing to his own land.

Mrs. L. B. Banks and Mr. A. B. Robinson write that Samuel Woodworth was the author of "The Old Oaken Bucket." Mr. Robinson contributes this anecdote:

Mr. Woodworth, in his search for fame and fortune, drifted to New York. Having walked one warm day from his office in Wall Street to his home in Duane Street, he drank a glass of water from the pump. "That is refreshing," said he, "but how much more refreshing would be a draught from the old oaken bucket I left hanging in my father's well at home." Following his wife's suggestion, "Why wouldn't that be a good subject for a poem?" he wrote the lines that made him famous.

A. H., Slater, Iowa. Is it true that a man must be perfect before he can have ground for hope of salvation?

The word perfect has many meanings. There is a perfection of sincerity in which a man serves God without hypocrisy. There is evangelical perfection by which the believer is perfect in Christ. There is perfection in which every part of the nature is consecrated to Christ. That is to say, a man is not to be Christian in some parts of his character and worldly and selfish in others. Christ said, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father who is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. 5: 48). Not that he must be perfect in the degree that

The Great Cullinan Diamond Presented to King Edward VII

ON the occasion of the birthday of the British King, November 9, the famous Cullinan diamond was presented to him by the Transvaal government. Unusual precautions were taken for safeguarding the splendid jewel, which Sir Richard Solomon, representing the Transvaal authorities, took with him under strong escort from London to Sandringham. The party drove to the royal residence, accompanied by a dozen detectives, and were received by the king. The ceremony of presentation was brief. At its conclusion, the whole party, including two kings (those of England and Spain) and three queens (those of England, Spain and Norway), inspected and admired the superb stone. King Edward has not decided what disposition to make of the diamond. It is understood that certain tests will be made of the great jewel with radium and electricity for scientific purposes. With the best result possible in cutting, there would be a single stone of four or five ounces from the original seven ounces. The Excelsior, the largest previous diamond, weighs only one ounce and three-quarters. There is a possibility that the stone may fly into fragments when cutting is attempted.

God is perfect. Even Wesley did not teach that. But he must not obey in part and disobey in part. His desire is for perfection. That is the goal to strive after. A man has ground for hope of salvation when he believes in Christ. He then begins a course of sanctification by which he is continually growing more like him, that is, nearer perfection. Neither Peter, nor John, nor Paul were perfect, yet they had good "ground for hope of salvation."

M. E. P., Glens Falls, N. Y. What was the fault for which Dr. Crapsey was condemned by his church?

It was not for any fault, so far as we know. There was no question about his being an earnest, devoted, self-sacrificing clergyman. But he did not believe that Christ was born of a virgin, and said so. He believed that Joseph was Christ's father. You will easily see how far-reaching were the consequences of such a belief. It was for this that he was condemned and cast out of the ministry.

R. W. F., New Orleans, La. Why did the manslayer have to remain in the city of refuge until the high priest died?

It was an indeterminate sentence intended to curb carelessness as to the sanctity of human life. The manslayer must not, even if innocent of malice, return home at once. There must be some penalty for carelessness. It might be difficult to reckon the time for the individual persons, and the avenger might plead that he had erred in reckoning the period, but if a time was set when every city of refuge would give up its inmates, there could be no mistake. Of course there was a typical meaning, but that does not enter into the question of fact.

J. D. T., West Somerville, Mass. Is it true, as stated by a famous preacher, that the world is getting better?

We hope so. It would be a poor result of the tremendous effort put forth by the Church if it were not. We cannot believe that the preaching and the writing of good books is doing no more than maintaining the position attained. There must be progress, although there may be, in certain aspects of the situation, an apparent falling back. Probably there is less belief in the creeds of the churches than there used to be, but there are evidences that the conscience of the world is more active than formerly. A man would be ashamed now of doing things that in a former generation he would have done without scruple, and he knows public opinion demands a higher standard of him than ever. The principles of Christ are better understood now than they were in other generations, and they command larger allegiance, in men of all denominations. That is to say, Christianity has a firmer hold on the lives and thoughts of men than formerly, and that must tend to betterment.

L. Y. W., Hattiesburg, Miss. What is the meaning of the word "Swastika" and the pronunciation? Also, for what is this term emblematical?

The Swastika or Svastika is a symbol of unknown origin, and was apparently connected with the early sun-worshipers in India. It appears either as a cross in a circle or a cross with the arms bent at right angles. The latter symbol is found in heraldic and ecclesiastical work in Christian countries, as well as in the catacombs, and is known as the fylfot. Its equivalent is found in Egypt and it has also been exhumed by Schliemann at Troja. It is found also in China, Mexico and Peru. Some writers believed it to be derived from the Greek gamma, which they held to be suggestive of Christ as the corner-stone.

Addie M., Oxford, Pa. Who were the first writers to describe Niagara Falls, and to make a detour of them?

Father Hennepin visited them in 1678, and gave a detail. McCauslin visited them frequently between 1774 and 1783, and wrote much on the subject, and so also did Enys in 1787. Weld, 1796, Volney, 1798, Francis Hall, 1816, Gilpin, Schoolcraft, Captain Basil Hall and others.

S. Y., Manchester, N. H. Why is the State of Virginia called the "Old Dominion"?

It was sometimes recognized in its earlier history as a separate dominion. The poet Spenser dedicates his Faery Queen, published in 1590, to Elizabeth, Queen of England, France, Ireland and Virginia. When James VI. of Scotland ascended the English throne, Virginia was called the Fifth Kingdom. Virginia was faithful to Charles I., and his son, Charles II., in gratitude had the arms of Virginia quartered with those of England, Scotland and Ireland as a separate member of his possessions.

H. M. Hollis, N. Y. How much coast line has the State of Oregon?

It has three hundred miles of coast.

Miscellaneous

Several readers have written to us concerning the "merchant and trains" question, the correct solution of which was given in last week's Mail-Bag.

M. E. W., Ida. We have no information here in regard to the process. The bones are somewhat softened by cooking in some cases. In the majority of cases the bones are soft in their natural state. Write to some canning factory for full information.

Several Inquirers. Contributions for the Anglo-American School for Missionaries' Children at Kuling, China, whose needs were lately set forth in these columns by Dr. F. F. Meigs, the founder, may be sent to Brown Brothers & Co., Bankers, 59 Wall Street, New York, treasurer of the school.

A. S., Bensonhurst, L. I. We should use the means God has placed at our disposal and ask his blessing upon them. Naaman was ordered to bathe seven times in Jordan, and even Christ gave an example of the use of the means at hand when he made a salve of spittle and clay and anointed the eyes of the blind (see John 9:6).

J. W., Hankinson, N. D. We have found no additional information in regard to Richard Realf, to that contained in your letter. If you wrote to Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., he might be able to give you the address of some one who could tell you more. Professor Hart is an authority on the history of the time of John Brown, under whom Realf served.

The Sight-Singing Classes

EVERY human being with a soul for music loves to sing. If he cannot read music he must either follow others by rote or else sit silent. In Madame Newman's sight-singing course the lessons are arranged in such a clear, concise and simple manner that self-instruction is within the reach of every student. The lessons begin at the very foundation and lead upward by easy stages. While adapted to the needs of those who have no musical knowledge, they are valuable also to musicians who have not studied sight-singing.

This course meets the want of the student who cannot leave home to study and who cannot afford the high rates of a city tutor. It fills the need of that large class whose limited means have hitherto deprived them of musical education. Its advantages are too obvious to need enumeration here.

One pupil, a lady, writes: "I enjoy the lessons greatly and can now start any piece of music, whether it is in sharps or flats." A minister writes: "I was anxious to see a little into your method of teaching at first, but now I am entirely satisfied and send my fee for entire cost." Hundreds of other pupils write expressing satisfaction with the progress they are making.

The cost for the entire course is no larger than is asked for a single lesson at any of the musical institutes in our great cities, while the advantages are substantially the same as those of a conservatory. Many persons have written securing the course of lessons as a Christmas gift to some friend who is ambitious of learning to sing at sight. Courses 20 and 21 are now forming. These will be followed by other classes. Send name and address to Musical Department, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, for all information.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Reminiscence of Napoleon*

AT last the time came when Napoleon and his young neighbor at St. Helena must part. The health of Betsy's mother, Mrs. Balcombe, was not good, and the family decided to go home to England. Mr. Balcombe obtained six months' leave, but, although the family professed to expect to return, in their secret hearts they felt that they were bidding good-bye to St. Helena.

A day or two before sailing Betsy and Jane went over to Longwood to say farewell to Napoleon. They found him in the billiard-room, as usual, surrounded by books. There was sadness in his voice as he talked about their departure.

"I hope your mother's health will soon be restored," he said. "Give her my kindest regards and best wishes for the journey. Soon you will be sailing away towards England, leaving me to die on this miserable rock. Look at those dreadful mountains—they are my prison walls. You will soon hear that the Emperor Napoleon is dead."

At these melancholy words the emotional Betsy burst into tears and Jane's eyes grew moist. Betsy sobbed as if her heart would break, and Napoleon, greatly moved, tried to comfort her. Betsy felt for her handkerchief, only to find that she had left it in her side-saddle pocket. So Napoleon, holding his own toward her, said, "Take it, and keep it in remembrance of this sad day."

The sisters went the rounds of Longwood, bidding good-bye to all that was dear to them. Later they dined with Napoleon, but Betsy was still so overcome with grief that she could hardly swallow.

"Take some bonbons," said Napoleon kindly.

"I cannot," she cried. "My throat has a swelling, and I cannot eat!"

When at last they were ready to go, the Emperor embraced the two sisters with great affection.

"Do not forget me!" he said. "I thank you for your kindness and friendship, and all my happy hours in your society."

The two sisters could hardly reply.

"Mees Betsee," he added, after a moment's pause, "what would you like to have in remembrance?"

"A lock of your hair," sobbed the young girl, "better than anything else."

"Marchand shall bring the scissors, then;" and the devoted Marchand, promptly obeying, severed four locks for the four older members of the Balcombe family.

Not long before they left, Napoleon in a conversation with Mr. Balcombe, said:

"I fear that your resignation of your employment in this island is caused by the quarrels and annoyances drawn upon you by the relation established between your family and Longwood, in consequence of the hospitality which you showed on my first arrival in St. Helena. I would not wish you to regret having known me."

Although Mr. Balcombe did not exactly confirm what Napoleon said about the reason for his withdrawal from St. Helena, he knew that to a great extent it was true.

As it was, they went back to England the middle of March, 1818, little more than three years before Napoleon's death. Their ship was the Winchelsea store-ship, on its way from China, and on the same vessel went General Gorgaud, the Bachelor of Napoleon's suite, a pompous, though brave man, for whom Betsy had no especial liking. General Gorgaud knew that he would never return to St. Helena. Mr. Balcombe had obtained a six months' leave from his official duties, but he, too, may have felt as the vessel sailed away that he was unlikely ever again to look upon its frowning walls.

As to Betsy, Napoleon's young neighbor, the tears that fell from her eyes when she said her last good-bye to the Emperor were not the last that she shed for him. As the years went by she ever listened eagerly to all the news that came from St. Helena, until the final mournful tidings in the early summer of 1821, that Napoleon had died on the fifth of May.

* From Napoleon's Young Neighbor, by Helen Leah Reed. Illustrated. A book based on Mrs. Abell's Recollections of Napoleon (1847), and founded on real incidents which occurred during his imprisonment at St. Helena. Pp. 267. Price $1.50. Cloth covers. Little, Brown & Co., Boston, publishers.

Books Received

The Conquest, by Daisy Fitzhugh Ayres, is a frothy little story of Washington smart society and the manner in which its outposts are stormed by the newly rich, who have "won out" in the game of pulling a political plum from the government's pie. Incidentally, the wiles of the fair sex come in for analysis, with a true note sounded of a Western wife who schemes to retain her Congressman-husband's love in the new regime. The Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington. Pp. 344. Price $1.50.

The third of Antonio Fogazzaro's Trilogy of Rome has appeared under the title of The Sinner. Oddly enough, the first to appear, The Saint, is the third in the order of the related romances, the present work introducing the hero in his earlier and unregenerated state. The dramatic and touching story of Piero Maironi is told in the three books, the author of which is attracting much serious consideration in literary quarters. In all of Fogazzaro's work nature is described with a poetic fervor which forms an admirable background for the humanity which throbs through the series. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York and London. Pp. 420. Price $1.20.

When Robert Morss Lovett wrote A Winged Victory he gave to the novel-reading public a spirited and unusual character in his heroine, little Dora. There are many lines of interest worked out in the somewhat complex plot, with dramatic situations rising out of the elements of heredity versus environment. The college life is fascinating in its presentation, with Constance Dare as the typical college girl. Duffield & Co., New York. Pp. 431. Price $1.50.

Under the general editorship of Henry Van Dyke, a number of literary gems are in process of preparation for the advanced student's needs, which are known as The Gateway Series. Among these, Mrs. Gaskell's Cranford has passed through the skilful hands of Charles Elbert Rhodes, A.M., professor of English in one of the Buffalo high schools. Mr. Rhodes, with simplicity and thoroughness, added to the text proper of the work itself a short life and excellent portrait of the author. Notes, explaining allusions and fine points and analyzing the underlying purpose of the story, are exceedingly helpful to those beginning the study of literature. The American Book Company. New York and Chicago. Pp. 312. Price 40 cents.

A Brief History of the United States, by John Bach McMaster, Professor of American History in the University of Pennsylvania. A book written for school work. It would be valuable also to the older readers as a book for ready reference. This would apply more to the colonial and revolutionary periods. Cloth; pp. 434. Price $1. Outlines for Review of Roman History, by Charles Bertram Newton and Edwin Bryant Treat. Cloth; pp. 62. Very valuable for students reviewing for an examination on this subject. American Book Company, publishers, New York City.

Running Water is A. E. W. Mason's most recent contribution to the list of clever books of which he is the author. It is full of incident and movement and the plot is of such absorbing interest that it pushes the reader on, chapter after chapter, until the last leaf is turned, at one sitting. If there is any more thrillingly realistic description of Alpine climbing than Mr. Mason has succeeded in giving, it is not found between the covers of a popular novel. The Century Company, New York. Pp. 352. Price $1.50.

Ever since Ben Hur won the interest and respect of lovers of historical romance, many similar plots have been worked out and presented to the public for approval. A Victor of Salamis, by William Stearns Davis, is a grim story of war and bloodshed, with a young Athenian athlete and his beautiful girl-wife as the centres of interest in the story. Contests at the Isthmian games are described with color and vigor; perhaps the story of Thermopylæ, which is exceedingly well told, is the most effective feature of the book. The author is to be congratulated upon his lifelike, if daring, portraiture of such early Greek celebrities as Leonidas and Themistocles. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 450. Price $1.50.

sionary Pioneers in Uganda†

ORKERS in our Sunday Schools and Young People's Missionary Societies have long deplored the ex-ng dearth of literature which tends to op missionary interest and knowledge g bright, up-to-date boys and girls. are leaflets galore, colorless and l; there are histories of mission fields and "Lives" of missionaries, into which serious minded adults may delve for information. But if these are placed upon the shelves of the Sunday School, Christian Endeavor or Epworth League libraries, there they remain, so far as the young people of the churches are concerned.

Uganda's White Man of Work, recently included in the Forward Mission Study Course, is, we trust, the beginning of a long line of similar contributions to readable missionary literature for youth, from the pen of its brilliant and gifted young author. The men and women of Christendom know the splendidly heroic life story of Alexander M. Mackay. How many boys and girls under fifteen have thrilled with excitement as they traveled through the African jungle with that noble missionary pioneer, have grieved over his discouragements and gloried in his triumphs?

Mrs. Sophia Lyon Fahs, herself the daughter of a widely known and beloved missionary to Japan, has written a narrative, glowing with action and accurate in every detail, of Uganda and its call for help from the Christian world. The fact that they are being thoroughly instructed in missionary history is quite forgotten by the young readers in their vivid interest in the story.

Secular history has been made the basis of many an absorbing tale; there is no reason why the bloodless battles—fought against privations and hardships unspeakable, in order that the standard of the Cross might be planted upon heathen soil—should not be clothed in that simplicity of incident and illustration which stimulate the attention of the youthful mind. To this end Mrs. Fahs has worked. In this purpose she has eminently succeeded.

Freedom in the Church, by Alexander V. G. Allen, a plea for toleration of criticism of the doctrines of the church and an effort to show the basis of truth in them which underlies the accretions of the theologians. Pp. 223. Price $1.50. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York.

Chinatown Ballads, by Wallace Irwin. This is a small book of clever verse, describing life in the Chinese quarter of San Francisco. There is a pleasant jingle to the verses that stays in the memory, and at the same time the reader gleans much information regarding the life of the transplanted Orientals. Cloth; pp. 81. Price $1.25. Fox, Duffield & Co., New York.

The Long Road from Russia to Siberia, traveled by men and women and little children, is described by John Oxenham in words which give flesh and blood to the pen-and-ink humanity. The Katias and Stepans, the Peters and Katenkas live and love, suffer and grow strong, among the wolves of the Siberian steppes, finding their happiness in each other as surely as the sheltered denizens of softer climes. The book is an addition to a little-developed field of the novelist. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 355. Price $1.50.

As many as possible of the standard hymns and others which contain a useful thought or introduce a new strain, have been gathered between two covers by Theron Brown and the late Hezekiah Butterworth. The music is not given, but the words of each hymn are accompanied by a well-told story of its author and the circumstances under which it was written. The Story of the Hymns and Tunes is excellent, both in choice of material and in apposite comment. It is illustrated by good portraits. American Tract Society, New York. Pp. 555. Price $1.50. Postage 18 cents.

Alexander Wilson, Poet-Naturalist, by James Southall Wilson. The man who is the subject of this biography was the first ornithologist to make a study of American birds. He has not hitherto received the credit that was his due for his studies. He was born in Scotland and for a time was a weaver. He loved birds and poetry and while yet young he had made these two his life's work, or rather pleasure, for he was not satisfied unless writing verses or discovering something new of the habits of his feathered friends. He knew Burns and visited him in his Ayrshire home. Two years before Burns' death Wilson came to America and was the pioneer in the study of American ornithology. The book has been well written by Prof. Wilson. Cloth cover: 179 pages; price $2 Mosby's Men, by J. H. Alexander. Cloth cover; 186 pages. Illustrated with photographs of members of Mosby's command; price $2 The Life of Dr. Samuel A. Mudd, by Nettie Mudd. Preface by D. Eldridge Monroe, of the Baltimore bar. Cloth cover: 326 pages; portraits; price $3. The Life and Services of John Newland Moffitt, by Emma Martin Moffitt. Captain Moffitt was a well-known officer in the United States Navy in the days before the Civil War. During that conflict he served under the Confederacy. The autobiography contains many interesting sketches of naval life, as seen by the wife of an officer. Cloth cover; 428 pages; portraits; price $3. Pausanias, a Dramatic Poem, by Charles William Kennedy and James Southall Wilson. Cloth cover; 60 pages; price $1.25. All of the above five books are published by the Neale Publishing Company, New York and Washington.

The Golden Rule Saloon

By MARION EARL

CHAPTER V—Concluded

THE storekeeper, at the suggestion of Marvin, called on Mary Jones early in the forenoon, and in a roundabout way made her understand that unless her folks voted right, steps would be taken to collect the old grocery bills and no credit would be granted in the future. Emphasis was placed on her own power to help. If all went well, her debt would be canceled and she would get future favors. But if not, she must pay at once. She succeeded in persuading several men who had said they would help Neal.

The opportunity for which Marvin was watching came in the afternoon. Neal stood on a dry-goods box, pouring forth one of his fiery addresses, when the town constable arrested him. The trumped-up charge was obstructing the street. He was taken to the jail and locked up. And the report went out over town that he was drunk again, and had had to be taken off the street.

Once in the little wooden jail on the alley back of Marvin's Place, Neal was in the enemy's power. Securing the keys from the constable, Marvin and an accomplice visited the prisoner. By force, they compelled him to drink the liquor they had brought. The exact methods used are no essential part of this record; enough to say that he was released before night, so under the power of liquor that it was generally believed that he had been intoxicated when making the speech at the time of his arrest.

When the ballots were counted, it was found that the vote stood in favor of license by three majority. The methods of the ungodly had won. The victors paraded the streets at midnight, singing, shouting, firing guns, blowing horns and beating drums. Mary Jones was seen waving her handkerchief and shouting, "We beat the Christians that time!" The saloons were open all night. At Marvin's Place there was a reveling crowd that spent its breath in cursing the church, and Walter Bush in particular.

"Let's give him a coat of feathers and ride him out of town, just to teach him to tend to his preaching, and let other people's business alone," some one suggested. They took it up and got all the enjoyment possible out of discussing it. It might have led to action, if the storekeeper had not vetoed it on the ground that it would hurt the town to do a thing like that, and that the man "had got his medicine anyway." So the proposition was dropped.

Lee had taken his part in the campaign, but the methods used sickened him. He was fair-minded in the main and believed in fair play. He knew that the victory was not legitimate. He knew it did not represent the wish of the people, and that if it had not been for the money and unfair pressure used, the result would have been otherwise.

Next day, the worst element of the town was still celebrating. The liquor flowed freely at both saloons. Lee was kept busy at the bar all the morning. Just after dinner, he refused to sell more liquor to a man who had been drunk since the previous day, and who had no money to pay. The man was angry and tried to help himself. He succeeded in getting hold of a long-necked bottle, which he used as a weapon in the struggle which followed. It lasted only a moment. The saloonkeeper received a blow which deprived him of consciousness. When he came to himself, hours had passed and he lay in his bed at home, his aunt, who was his housekeeper, standing over him. The recovery was rapid; but the hours of quiet, when he could do nothing but think, did their work for him.

It was Saturday when he went down town for the first time. On his way he stopped to see Lucy Neal, who by this time was able to get around a little on her crutches. She was only ten, but she bore the air of one much older. Lee sat for a few moments and talked to her. Suddenly she asked him a question that startled him.

"What makes you keep a saloon, Mr. Lee?"

"Why, what makes you ask?" he managed to reply.

"I've been thinking about it as I've been lying here. Is there a great deal of money in keeping a saloon?"

"Yes, there's some money made that way."

"But don't you know it does lots of harm to people? Now, there's my papa, he's so kind to me when he is sober. But he almost killed me that night; and he says he wouldn't have done it if it hadn't been that he was drunk. And he says he can't keep sober, with the saloons right under his eyes all the time. I'd think the people would make the saloons stop. When I get big I'm going to ask them to." She paused for an instant, then with a sudden turn asked another question.

"Are you a bad man, Mr. Lee? I can't think you are, for you have been so good to me."

Under her gaze he felt very uncomfortable.

"I don't believe I'm a very good man, Lucy."

"That's what some folks say. But why don't you stop selling liquor, and be a good man?"

He did not reply for a moment. Then he said in a whisper that sounded strange to his own ears, "I'm going to, Lucy!"

He looked up and saw May Johnson in the door. She was coming in with some fresh geraniums for the invalid. He wondered if she had heard what he said. He rather hoped that she had. Somehow, her presence helped to strengthen the resolution so quickly expressed. Lucy was so innocent and frank that he could not be offended at her. He went out with a purpose which shaped itself into definite form that day.

CHAPTER VI

NEXT morning, the congregation at Mr. Bush's church had begun the regular service and were singing the hymn before the sermon, when Roy Lee entered and walked with deliberation down the aisle. Instead of finding a seat, he walked to the altar where he stopped and stood facing the preacher. The hymn ended, and still he stood there. When all was quiet, he spoke. He addressed the preacher in the pulpit.

"Mr. Bush, I have come here to make a confession and ask for mercy. It may not be the proper way to do it, but I thought you would help me. May I say a few words to the people here?"

His manner was so unmistakably sincere that permission was given. The preacher felt that the matter was not out of place, though he was too much surprised to imagine what could be intended. Lee turned to the congregation and delivered, in a slow, hesitating manner, the most remarkable talk ever heard in that auditorium.

"I came here to tell you that I am done with the saloon business. I went into the business to make money. I didn't understand what it meant. I have always said it was a man's own business whether he drank or not. I thought I could keep a respectable place; but I've learned different. I'll tell you what it is: I've been in hell ever since I started the saloon. I know as well as you do that the town would have gone dry, if the people had been left to their way: I did try to be decent; but no man can be decent who has anything to do with a saloon. I've had my lesson. I was to blame for the trouble Arthur Hood got into. I was to blame for his father's death. I was to blame for Lucy Neal's sufferings. I am to blame for so much wrong and wickedness that I don't know that God will ever forgive me; but I've promised him I would quit, and I want you to help me. I can't sell the usiness; that would keep the wickedness our midst. I am going to give the keys your pastor. You can have possesion, and I will help you empty out all e liquors, and will promise never to gage in the business again."

The proposal was accepted. The serce was adjourned to the saloon. Lee d the preacher walked arm in arm rough the street, followed by the congegation. They made short work of it. here was not a spoonful of liquor that as not poured out when they finished. alf the town was there to see when ey sang the doxology at the close.

Such was the end of the Golden Rule loon. The fixtures were donated to a ce reading and club room. Lee began e again as a clerk in a store, but was e of the happiest of men. He had t money, but he had found his manod.

Andy Neal succeeded in reforming and ame a respected citizen. When he beue sober, after the shameful treatnt at the hands of Marvin, he was in terror of despair. He shut himself in his room and refused to see any . At last he sent for Walter Bush, d together they fought out a hard tle. They spent the whole night in room. The preacher insisted that al pray.

'Me pray? I am not fit to pray."

'Any man who has need of God is lo pray. The man who is most in d has the best right to pray."

Neal's idea of the matter was that he uld reform first. The man became erly humble that night. He came th from that room to live a temperate , and to become an influence for d in the town.

Plans were carefully laid and next ing Marvin's Place was wiped out h a substantial majority vote. There e been no saloons in Clear Lake ce, and it is one of the most prosous towns in the State.

One evening, after the final victory, Lee and May Johnson came toher by chance at the street corner. As both were going up the main street they walked in company. He had resolved never to try to renew the old relationship. He felt that he had forfeited all right to any woman's respect, and was keenly sensitive as to his past, the shame of which became more and more acute. No man, when he is engaged in wrong, sees the hideousness of his deeds. It is only afterward, as he begins to climb to higher vantage points of righteousness, that he beholds the terrible pit in which he wallowed.

They passed the old Golden Rule Saloon, now a popular reading room.

"You can't imagine how glad I am that the saloons are driven out," he ventured, not quite knowing if it were possible for him to say what he had in mind.

"You did a manly thing, Mr. Lee, when you went out of the business. I have often wanted to tell you that it was the greatest good that ever came to the town."

Encouraged by her manner he proceeded. "But think what a wrong I did when I went into the business. I can never forget the things I saw and heard that year. I can't right all the wrong. I don't wonder that people don't respect me. I can't respect myself."

"But people do respect you," she replied, in her quiet manner. "You have no right to condemn yourself too severely. You have shown that you were too manly to go on in the business. No one doubts for a moment your present position. It is easy for any one to go into wrong; the real test is in the repentance, and you have surely made atonement for the wrong. You have done all that can be done to right that wrong."

Her words and spirit were like the entrance of a great light into his life. Was that light merely a delusive flare, or an abiding sun, whose radiance could yet redeem his life from the twilight of despair into which his spirit was passing? He settled the doubt by a question.

"Do you think I could ever be worthy of your respect and confidence again?"

"It is not impossible," was the answer, which came like the dawn of a great hope.

Life's Lesson

SCHOOL-DAYS ended, tasks all done,
Put the books I loved away;
Work is over, victory won.
Naught to conquer, day by day.

Did I say it? Hard tasks ended?
So it seemed long years ago.
When before me bright, well tended
Flowers gay appeared to grow.

Flowers gay, whose beauty faded
E'er I breathed their fragrance sweet.
Thorn-crowned sorrows life has shaded—
Weary pathways for my feet.

Naught to conquer? Is it so,
As we pass the toilsome years?
Naught but self, and sin, and sorrow,
And our faithless, blinding fears?

Oft we long to hear the message
Of our Father's sweet "Well done,"
When, within the heavenly kingdom,
Work is over, victory won.

Woman's Progress in France

WHAT is known as the "Feminist Movement" in France has already had some interesting developments. The Paris municipality has already licensed a woman cabdriver, and Miss Money, a young woman, has applied for a license as a jockey or horse-trainer. France has also led the way, in Europe at least, in letting women become lawyers, passing a law on December 4, 1900, enabling them to do so. The same year a Russian, Madame Petit, was empowered to plead, and on February 23, 1901, Mlle. Jeanne Chauvier was called to the bar. The latest newcomer, Mlle. Miropolsky, is a Pole by birth, and like most of her country-women—notably Madame Curie, the talented co-discoverer of radium—she is very quick and bright. She has a charming voice, and according to a Parisian journalist, possesses the most winning ways when she is pleading at the bar. Our portrait is from a recent photograph of the new Polish Portia.

Mlle. Miropolsky, the Newly Admitted Lawyer

The Forward Missionary Movement

THE Layman's Forward Missionary Movement, which was inaugurated in New York City a year ago, has made rapid progress in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Many churches have greatly increased their givings, but Toronto, Canada, is the first city of any considerable size where its principles have been widely applied. A leading spirit of the enterprise is Mr. J. Campbell White, of New York, a prominent Presbyterian and secretary of the International Layman Missionary Movement. He held parlor conferences in Toronto with prominent business men of several of the churches. On November 9 he addressed about a hundred leading laymen of the Episcopal, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist and Congregational churches, including the president of the Board of Trade and many of the wholesale and retail merchants. The givings of the Toronto churches for missions during the past year are about $140,000. It was proposed by the Hon. Justice Maclaren, K. C., that that amount should be more than doubled for the current year. It was unanimously resolved to more than treble last year's contribution, and to reach a minimum of at least half a million dollars. It was shown that the United States and Great Britain gave about eighty-five per cent. of the whole world's contribution for missions, and that of this Great Britain gave almost half.

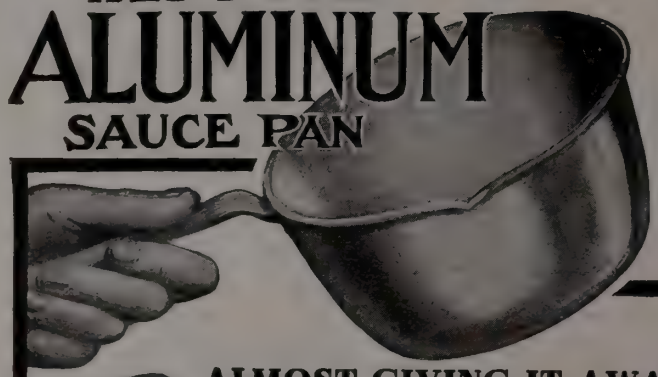
Will you Accept for this PURE ALUMINUM SAUCE PAN 10c PREPAID?



ALMOST GIVING IT AWAY!

To get you acquainted with HOME QUEEN

The most popular Family Magazine for Women

I'm willing to let my readers have this useful and valuable utensil for 10c to advertise my big magazine and increase its long list of friends (now over 300,000.) This interesting monthly certainly could not have gained so many readers without its fascinating stories and other valuable reading. I want many thousands more grateful readers. That is why I make this remarkable offer.

This famous Aluminum Ware that I offer at such a ridiculous price is certainly the best there is. Food cooks better and faster than in others, for pure aluminum is so thin and light the heat gets through quicker than through tin, iron or agate ware. Food is evenly cooked or baked; no stirring necessary.

No Burned or Scorched Food!

No cracks nor seams to catch the food. Nothing to breed microbes. Because pan is all in one piece, no poisonous solder acids are used in making it. It's a health and life saver. Nothing to chip off and mix with the food. It looks like silver, polishes better, wears longer. No ware as strong, serviceable or durable. It makes cooking a pleasure.

Best Family Magazine, one year, and the Sauce Pan—Both for 35 cents.

I make this liberal offer to all who subscribe for Home Queen. As the price is but 25 cents a year, and as I offer the sauce pan for ten cents you need send but 35 cents for both. Has such an offer ever been equalled? Remember, you get the magazine for 12 months and the pan, both for 35 cents, both prepaid. If not satisfied with the pan after getting it; if you don't consider it an immense bargain, just return it, and I'll refund your money at once. But I'm sure you won't want to return it.

What Home Queen Is

Home Queen is one of the most entertaining magazines published. It is chock full of splendid stories by best writers, stories of true and tender heart interest. Next year it will publish stories by Charles Garvice, George Sheldon, Mrs. Alex McVey Miller, Emma Garrison Jones and other well-known writers. In one year you get at least 5 long stories that would compare favorably with the regular $1.50 book if in book form, besides 20 or more shorter stories. There is something in Home Queen for the entire family—wit and humor, poems, answers to correspondents, etc.

It is of particular value to women, on account of its Fashions, Household Hints, Recipes, etc.

Send stamps or silver; don't delay. The demand for this Aluminum Pan may be so great that when my large supply is exhausted, there may be delay in filling orders of those who come late. Just write name and address in blank at corner of this ad. You will learn too, how to obtain any or all of the other pieces of aluminum ware, without paying one penny. I will send Sauce Pan by return mail and Home Queen for one year.

MORE THAN EVER

Increased Capacity for Mental Labor Since Leaving Off Coffee.

Many former coffee drinkers who have mental work to perform, day after day, have found a better capacity and greater endurance by using Postum Food Coffee instead of ordinary coffee. An Ills. woman writes:

"I had drank coffee for about twenty years, and finally had what the doctor called 'coffee heart.' I was nervous and extremely despondent; had little mental or physical strength left; had kidney trouble and constipation.

"The first noticeable benefit derived from the change from coffee to Postum was the natural action of the kidneys and bowels. In two weeks my heart action was greatly improved and my nerves steady.

"Then I became less despondent, and the desire to be active again showed proof of renewed physical and mental strength.

"I am steadily gaining in physical strength and brain power. I formerly did mental work and had to give it up on account of coffee, but since using Postum I am doing hard mental labor with less fatigue than ever before."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

The Passing of the Pine

THE position which the United States has held as a lumber-producing nation has, perhaps, been due more to white pine than to any other wood. This timber, which has played a most important part in the material development of the nation, is fast disappearing, and now it is as costly as the finest American hardwoods.

The white pine production has shifted from New England to the Lake States. Michigan was the leading lumber-producing State for twenty years, from 1870 to 1890, with a supremacy based on white pine. In these two decades the cut was one hundred and sixty billions of board feet, valued, at the point of production, at not less than two billions of dollars. The rich forests of Michigan were once thought inexhaustible and lumbering continued in a most reckless manner for years. Suddenly, the people awoke to the fact that the thoughtless destruction of the trees had thrown 6,000,000 acres on the delinquent tax list. These white pine barrens point to the terrible penalty of wasting the forest resources, which should have been the heritage of all future generations.

The best stands of white pine in this country now are in scattered sections in Minnesota, New England and parts of Idaho. The species in Idaho is sometimes called "silver pine." Some of the country's best white pine is found on the Indian reservations in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and scattered stands are found in the States of Wyoming, Montana, Colorado, and one or two other States. At the present rate of cutting the tree will soon be practically a thing of the past. The small stands in the National forests are inconsiderable; but they will be managed with the greatest conservatism by the Government through the Forest Service, and through this method and the practice of reforestation it may be hoped that the fine old tree will furnish timber for other generations.

Answered Prayers

I THANK thee, Lord, for mine unanswered prayers,
Unanswered save thy quiet, kindly "Nay";
Yet it seemed hard among my heavy cares
That bitter day.

I wanted joy; but thou didst know for me
That sorrow was the gift I needed most;
And in its mystic depths I learned to see
The Holy Ghost.

I wanted health; but thou didst bid me sound
The secret treasuries of direst pain,
And in the moans and groans my heart oft found
The Christ again.

I wanted wealth; 'twas not the better part;
There is a wealth with poverty oft given;
And thou didst teach me of the gold of heart,
Best gift of heaven.

I thank thee, Lord, for these unanswered prayers,
And for thy word, the quiet, kindly "Nay."
'Twas thy withholding lightened all my cares
That blessed day. OLIVE HUCKEL.

H. H. S., Nevada. "I take this opportunity to express my earnest belief in answered prayers. My prayers have been heard and answered many times."

M. J. C., Massachusetts. "I promised the Lord that if he would answer my prayer I would acknowledge it to the world. He heard and answered. I pray that this may help some other soul to trust wholly in God."

Reader, Pennsylvania. "I want to publicly acknowledge how graciously God has answered my prayer. I was on the verge of financial ruin, was deeply in debt and in ill-health, with no friends to help. I was not a Christian. The way looked dark indeed. I learned to love the Answered Prayer Column and through it was taught to have faith in God. Thanks to a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering Father, I can now say my debts are nearly all paid, I am restored to health with a bright and happy future before me. May this be an inspiration to others to trust God."

A. L. S. Two months ago I had a seaside cottage. It was rented, but the people did not pay. I was in debt for interest and taxes. A creditor took this time to urge me to pay up in full a debt for painting—a debt I was paying by instalments. It looked as if I should lose everything. This property was all I had. From it I derived my income. Taking up my Bible one evening, I opened it and read this verse: "Then I proclaimed a fast there, at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us and for our little ones, and for all our substance." Ezra 8: 21. I made up my mind to follow the example of Ezra. I set aside a day for fasting and prayer that God would show me a right way out of my perplexity. In three days a way opened for me, all my troubles were over, and I can say with Ezra (8: 23), "So we fasted and besought our God for this, and he was entreated of us."

WHAT WAS IT
The Woman Feared?

What a comfort to find it is not "the awful thing" feared, but only chronic indigestion, which proper food can relieve.

A woman in Ohio says:

"I was troubled for years with indigestion and chronic constipation. At times I would have such a gnawing in my stomach that I actually feared I had a—I dislike to write or even think of what I feared.

"Seeing an account of Grape-Nuts, I decided to try it. After a short time I was satisfied the trouble was not the awful thing I feared, but was still bad enough. However I was relieved of a bad case of dyspepsia, by changing from improper food to Grape-Nuts.

"Since that time my bowels have been as regular as a clock. I had also noticed before I begin to eat Grape-Nuts that I was becoming forgetful of where I put little things about the house, which was very annoying.

"But since the digestive organs have become strong from eating Grape-Nuts, my memory is good and my mind as clear as when I was young, and I am thankful." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the little booklet, "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

THE TYRANNY OF DRESS

By KATE UPSON CLARK

A DISTINGUISHED woman who was about to deliver an address at a great college for women, asked one of the woman professors for a few "pointers" before she began.

"Be sure to lay great stress upon careful dressing," said this lady. "You have no idea how little importance the girls here attach to it."

The lecturer was aghast. "Why, I was going to admonish them to beware of spending too much time on their clothes!" she gasped.

"Oh, you have just come from the outside world," explained her friend. "The society girl spends too much time on her finery; but the college girl, in the pressure of her daily duties and pleasures—the unending round of class-plays, and house parties, and society-teas—gives too little time to her ordinary toilet. When they get to the cap-and-gown stage, I shudder to think of the latitude they allow themselves."

"I was going to urge the adoption of the cap and gown among all college students everywhere—so loose, so healthful, so dignified."

"Don't do it! It covers a multitude of sins. Tell them no decent, self-respecting girl will ever leave her room in the morning, until she has at least made herself presentable. Please be emphatic."

The lecturer had so much sympathy with the girls that she did not, perhaps, bear so hard as her friend desired, on the morning sacrifice at the shrine of propriety. But she pondered well the matter, and it is now passed on to the consideration of others. It may be well enough to say that several fully informed individuals in that college and in others, dispute the wise professor's statement. They say that the case there is much as it is in the outside world. There are some slatterns, some over-nice ones, some foolishly vain ones. In these days, one must beware of generalizing. Let us often remind ourselves of Burke's great maxim, adapting it to various classes, "You cannot indict a whole people." At the same time, it cannot be too strongly impressed upon school and college girls that the reputation of your institution is going to rest not a little upon the appearance which its pupils present before the public.

In every home, especially where there are daughters, the time devoted to the sewing probably greatly exceeds that bestowed upon any other branch of the work. In the present elaborate and complicated styles of making gowns, it is hard to see how this can be helped. It looks simple oftentimes, when it is really fiendishly intricate. Now the family time and strength are like the family income—they ought to be divided systematically and sensibly between all its interests. Now, the clothing gets far more than its share.

A certain young woman, not a hundred miles from New York, became possessed with the idea that it was one's duty to "take proper care of one's appearance." She read diligently the woman's page in several daily journals; she expended a large share of the comfortable allowance her well-to-do father gave her on all sorts of unguents and manicuring implements, and she proceeded to carry out, as far as she was able, all the "directions" she could find. No true woman, she was told, would fail to apply "skin food" to her face for at least twenty minutes at night and in the morning. It should be patiently rubbed in. Then it should be rubbed off. Then a kind of "bleach" should be applied. Then powder very heavily. This should remain on for about twenty minutes in its turn, but should be most carefully rubbed off when the time came.

During the time the skin food was doing its lofty mission, this girl went through a series of gymnastic exercises—really almost the only useful thing she did—though her motive even then was not the truly fine one of health. She did them in order to make her waist small and her motions graceful. She applied certain things to her hair, two or three times each week, and also her finger nails. The care of her hair and nails alone every day took fully an hour and a half. Counting her elaborate baths, the adjustment of her clothes, and all the other details of her toilet, it took this girl nearly three hours every morning to dress herself, and more than half as long every night, with usually a ceremony of a similar sort somewhere in between!

Kate Upson Clark

The purchase of one's gowns, the fitting, the making—even when one has help or "puts them out"—consumes an enormous proportion of every well-dressed woman's available hours and days. One can scarcely remind one's self too often of the wise saying of Dr. Johnson, which he expresses something like this: "When we consider how many hours are spent each day in necessary care of the body, its sleep, its nourishment, its proper cleansing and arraying, how many are stolen from us by the languor of disease and inevitable social duties, we realize of how little time each one of us is really master."

Religion, education, literature, art, call loudly to us that we owe some sort of a duty to each and all. How can we train our families aright unless we keep at least somewhat in touch with them? We women must give a good deal of our time to the dress of our children and ourselves—but how much? Let us pray for the wisdom to make ourselves approved unto God, not needing to be ashamed, rightly dividing, not only the word, but our time, equally his gift.

Called Higher

Mrs. J. S. Ketterman, of Knoxville, Tenn., passed away recently. She was a stanch member of the Presbyterian Church and was known far and near for her kindly sympathy, going into homes where no other would minister. Her husband and four daughters survive her.

C. R. Stone, long a reader of this journal, died at Wills Hospital, Philadelphia, of heart failure, following an operation for cataract of the eye, on April 25. He was sixty-eight years of age, an earnest Christian and upright citizen, who was greatly beloved by a large circle of friends.

Stephen S. Wilson, an early settler in Ohio, died at his home on Badger Creek, Kan., April 12, 1907, aged eighty-three years. Mr. Wilson calmly awaited the great change, bidding his dear ones good-by until he should meet them again in the great hereafter. A wife and five children survive him.

Mrs. Samuel J. Howard, of East Georgia, Vt., passed away on July 22, after a brief illness. She was in her eightieth year and was a woman of beautiful Christian character and greatly beloved. For over fifty years she had been a member of the Methodist Church. This journal had been a constant visitor in her home for many years.

The Saxon, New York, Nov. 4, '05.
MESSRS. KIRTLAND BROS. & CO.

Gentlemen: I had with me on my recent European trip one of your Excelsior Solar Telescopes, with which I had the pleasure of observing an eclipse of the sun. At the Austrian Tyrol it was almost 80 per cent. concealed. Your Solar Eye Piece is a great thing. Its value to me on this occasion was many times greater than the entire outlay for the Telescope.

Yours truly, L. S. HENRY.

Count Cattle 20 Miles Away

I wish all to know how satisfactory the Excelsior Telescope is. Our farm is on the highest point in the surrounding country, one mile south of the junction of Walnut and Arkansas rivers. From our place we can see, with the aid of the Telescope, over into the Kansas Indian Reservation, nearly 20 miles; count the cattle and tell a horse from a cow; can see a large ranch 17 miles east that cannot be seen with the naked eye; can see the color and count windows with the Telescope. Again thanking you all for a square deal, I remain, Yours truly, F. G. PATTON.

ILLUSTRATION ABOUT ONE-THIRD ACTUAL LENGTH

Ruth as a Type

By Mrs. M. Baxter

EVERY revelation of God involves responsibility, and calls for self-surrender. Naomi set before her daughters-in-law how much was involved in returning with her to her native land; they must renounce for ever all self-made happiness. And this test it was which brought out in Ruth the true spirit of the bride. Orpah, who had not calculated on any such thing as real self-surrender, kissed her mother-in-law, and returned "unto her people, and unto her gods." Not so Ruth; God had made himself known to her, and her response was a full one. She said to Naomi, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me" (Ruth 1 : 16, 17). Here was a distinct choice which involved the most complete self-surrender: any lot with Naomi was better than the most prosperous without her; domestic happiness separate from Naomi and Naomi's God had no charm for Ruth.

It is just in this way that an awakened soul is brought to choose Jesus, and to follow him at whatever cost. Simply accepting his salvation is not true discipleship. To be a disciple is to choose him before friends, before comfort, before domestic happiness, before all else, because the heart sets a priceless value on him. The test of all things becomes simply this, "Do they separate me from Jesus?" "Will they involve my leaving Jesus?" "Entreat me not to leave thee." The question ceases to be one of obligation, "What is my duty?" "What ought I to do?" Himself absorbs the soul, and gives color to all else. This is true discipleship.

The question of discipleship once settled—the choice of the world or Christ—there arises next the question of service. Naomi had been to Ruth a saviour from the land of her birth with all its heathen associations. By her she was brought into the land of promise, and came to Bethlehem. Once there, Ruth sought, not from any stern sense of duty, but impelled by love, to manifest her gratitude by loving service. It was harvest time; and she said to her mother-in-law, "Let me now go to the field and glean ears of corn after him in whose sight I shall find grace." She went, and the first words which fell upon her ear from the lips of the Lord of the harvest-field were these, "The Lord be with you." Here Ruth was at home; the God of Naomi was known here.

It is a precious thing when a consecrated child of God enters the harvest-field and becomes a gleaner, if not a reaper of souls. And our harvest-work always takes its tone from our experience. If we ourselves are constantly struggling and striving, we shall lead our spiritual children into the same experience. If we know the blessed truth of rest in the Lord, they will speedily enter into the same, and be kept as others are not, from the power and dominion of sin.

Ruth was hardly in the harvest-field before Boaz, the lord of the harvest-field, took notice of her, and soon he came and spoke to her. Jesus makes precious revelations to our souls, sometimes through some Christian who draws us away from the far land to his own house of bread, he so shining through that friend as to win us into a position of nearness and of devoted consecration, even when our knowledge of his person is very indistinct. But when he speaks right into our souls, and claims relationship, surprising us by his unsuspected love, then it seems as though our hearts must go out in full return of love to him. "Hearest thou not, my daughter?" Ruth was overpowered. She fell on her face and bowed herself to him.

The Improved Reflectoscope is the most wonderful invention of the Twentieth Century, it is greater even than the Phonograph, more wonderful than the Stereopticon, more scientific than the Moving Picture Machine. Phonographs need records, Stereopticons need glass slides, Moving Picture Machines need Expensive Films, but all the Reflectoscope needs is the original pictures themselves. Post cards, Photographs, Newspaper and Magazine clippings or pictures of any kind can be shown and exact colors of the most beautiful picture projected on a screen life-size.

Here Is the Way to Get It.

We are going to give every reader of this magazine a chance to secure without spending a penny) one of the Improved Reflectoscopes, made especially for home entertainments.

This Wonderful Picture Machine, made of aluminum, will be sent you all complete, with a safety generator and a full set of views. It is not to cost you one cent, we are doing this because we want to give you a chance to give home entertainments to your friends and neighbors in such a way as has never been possible before, and at the same time make money for yourself, and lots of it, too.

The Wonderful New Reflectoscope will give the greatest picture show you ever saw. It takes the place of the high-priced Stereopticons that cost a hundred dollars or more, and have therefore always been out of reach because few people could afford to own them.

The Improved Reflectoscope is especially made and adapted for home entertainment. You don't need glass slides or films, all you need is the pictures themselves. Just take any post-card, photograph, magazine or newspaper pictures, put them in the machine and you can project a beautiful, large, clear, lifelike reproduction in original colors. What could be more simple?

Now, is it any wonder people say the Reflectoscope is a most marvelous invention?

"My boys tell me that the Reflectoscope purchased of you has proven in every way satisfactory."
Joseph H. Pullen, Cashier Bank of Houma.
Houma, La.

This is the kind of letters we receive every day from people who have received Reflectoscopes and are well pleased. The pictures show up clear and distinct on a screen from 6 to 10 feet, and furthermore the Reflectoscope is so simple in construction that any boy or girl can easily handle it with perfect safety. There is nothing to get out of order, nothing to wear out, because the machine is built substantial throughout, and made to last a lifetime. Every part of the machine is mechanically worked out among the most scientific principles by a man who knew every requirement of the home, and took everything into consideration to perfect a practical Picture Machine for the home.

FITTING OUT THE PACIFIC FLEET

IN the great shops of the Navy Yards at Brooklyn, Boston, Portsmouth, Norfolk, and Washington, the forges have been gleaming red far into the night, the clink, clink of hammers on bolt and rivets has gone on unceasingly, and thousands of men are toiling to complete the preparations on the battleship fleet that is soon to plow through the blue waters of the Atlantic on the way to the Pacific.

The preparations, however, are nearly complete, and the ships look as spick and span as if they were but newly launched. The amount of preparation necessary to equip a fleet for a very long cruise is something surprising to the mind of the ordinary citizen who reads up on naval subjects for the first time.

Over sixteen thousand mechanics have been at work on the ships. The Brooklyn Navy Yard and the Washington Navy Yard have about four thousand workmen each. The Charlestown Navy Yard at Boston, Mass., has two thousand, and the Navy Yard at League Island an equal number. The repair shops at the Norfolk Navy Yard, at Norfolk, Va., has three thousand, and the Portsmouth Yard at Kittery one thousand.

A warship has to be put in dry-dock and thoroughly overhauled at least once a year. If she is to maintain her schedule speed she has to be docked, and the steel plates below the water-line scraped and painted once in nine months. Innumerable sea growths, both animal and vegetable, attach themselves to the hull in a very short time, and these have to be removed.

An enormous quantity of paint is required. The white hulls that gleam with such snowy whiteness are only kept so by painting at short intervals. All of the vessels have been repainted in anticipation of the long cruise, from the keel to the very tips of the signal masts that pierce the blue far above the plated decks.

It will be necessary, however, to have them all thoroughly repainted, probably from the water-line up, as soon as they reach the California coast. Probably it stops on the way men will be swung over the sides with brushes and paint-pots to freshen up worn places on the metal sides. Salt water and the salty air soon damage beyond repair exposed iron and steel surfaces.

Every one of the guns on board, from those with a bore of sixteen inches, which are placed in the great turrets fore and aft, to the little rapid-fire pieces that bark from the fighting-tops, are thoroughly inspected. If the slightest flaw is found, a new piece that has been tried out at some proving-ground takes its place. The same care is given to the small arms of the marine corps, and to the weapons that are kept for the use of the sailors whenever a landing party is sent ashore.

Naval Base at Magdalena Bay

Jack at sea is as hard on his clothes as a small boy on his first vacation in the country. An extra supply is carried and new outfits will be given to a large part of the crews from naval stores on the Pacific Coast as soon as the ships arrive there.

The food for the cruise that was collected at the yard at Brooklyn would make the eyes of the hotel-keepers in our largest summer resorts stand out with astonishment. A few of the figures are: 61,000 pounds of corn meal, 1,200,000 pounds of flour, 500,000 pounds of canned fruits, 20,000 pounds of oatmeal, 25,000 pounds of cocoa, 150,000 pounds of salt pork, 50,000 pounds of ham, 1,000,000 pounds of beef, 100,000 pounds of mutton, 100,000 pounds of corned beef, 300,000 pounds of smoked meats, and about 80,000 pounds of meat of other kinds, including sausage, chipped beef, veal and pork. Over 800,000 pounds of potatoes will be carried, and 300,000 pounds of beans of various kinds. Other supplies will include many crates of eggs, cans of tomatoes, jars of milk, syrup and vinegar, and numerous fruits, fish, hominy, barley, tea, coffee, sugar, etc.

The department is very careful concerning the quality of food that is served to the sailors, as poor food would mean an epidemic which would spread with fearful rapidity where men are more or less crowded together, as they usually are in the confined quarters of a warship. The food is tested by inspectors, and must reach a certain standard before it will be accepted. Of course, here and there, something not up to the requirements will slip through when the food is bought in such quantities; but it is generally found out, and the firm that supplied that particular article will be sure to hear from the Navy Department in Washington.

The men in a "mess" very often contribute to buy delicacies they may wish extra, but those that depend on Uncle Sam alone will certainly not go hungry, as the foregoing jot plainly shows. The officers of each ship always pay a certain amount to have their "mess" supplied with many articles that are not furnished by the government. This sum usually reaches a high figure during a cruise, and constitutes quite a drain on the officers' monthly pay. The officers also have to pay for the entertaining that they must necessarily do whenever they touch at the ports of other countries. The officers on shore always give entertainments and banquets to the officers of the visiting fleet in order to show their friendliness to America. The officers have to make returns in kind. A single evening's entertaining costs

AMERICAN PULPIT

A SERMON BY
Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

Profession and Conduct

TEXT—Matt. 5: 47
"What do ye more than others?"

IN the words of my text, Christ separates the inhabitants of the whole world into two groups. First, here is the group of the men of the world, and yonder is the group of the servants of Christ. "Now," says Jesus, "these two groups are entirely different in characteristics and in their conception of life. The members of one group are living for themselves; they are scheming and planning how they can use men for their own advantage. The one group says, "I must first fill my own larder and look after my own enjoyment. No matter whether other people have a good time or not, I must make life easy for number one." The other group says, "I must live for God and for my fellow men. I must help the overburdened carry the load they are staggering under. I must be eyes for the blind, crutches for the lame, food for the hungry. I must learn to forgive men as I hope God will forgive me." Then Christ says to point the moral: "For if ye love them that love you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the Gentiles the same?" Probably there was not a man within sound of his voice who did not pride himself on being better than a publican. He was therefore bringing the matter home to them when he asked them in what way they were better.

It might be well if we asked ourselves such a question. We call ourselves Christians and it is a great title. There is no name on earth so noble as that of being a follower of Christ. We have a right to glory in the name, but there is a character which should go with the name, otherwise the name is a mockery. What is that character? In what way does the Christian differ from the non-Christian? As Christ put it, "What do ye more than others?" Are you different from the men of the world in your desires, in your treatment of your fellow men? Are you different in your modes of enjoyment? Are you different in the way you spend your money? Do you love only those who love you? Do you love your enemies? Do you do good to them that hate you? These are the home questions that Jesus is addressing to you to-day.

How to Make Friends

First, how are you treating your brethren in a social way? By that I mean in your evenings, and in the times when you are away from the store and can do as you choose. You are at liberty to select your own friends. You invite to your home those whom you wish to invite. You visit those whom you wish to visit. What is the spirit which guides you in the selection of your friends? Are your principles in this matter different from those that guide the actions of the man of the world? Is your chief idea to make friends with those whom you can help? Or do you simply make friends of those whose association is likely to benefit you? This is a very vital question for you to decide, for you have the character of Christian to maintain.

The ability to make friends and hold them to you in a vice-like grip is a great art. The more I see those who have mastered this art the more I am impressed with the fact that the essentials of making friends rest not in a big house, or in a large bank account, but in the magic touch of a hand and in the persuasive power of a voice. As I was thinking upon this subject the other day there rose up before my mind the face of a lady who is a friend to every one she knows. Now this lady is not handsome in physical beauty. Far from that. No artist would ever select her for a model. She is not wealthy. She lives in an humble home of only a few rooms. Where you spend the dollars she has only nickels to spend. She is not a musical genius. She can neither sing nor speak from a platform, nor write poetical effusions. Her clothes may once have been in style, but for the most part they have gone through the wear and tear of two or three winters. Yet wherever that lady goes she always makes friends. These friends belong to all classes of people. The rich and the poor alike come to her home. No mansion is so grand that she is not given a cordial welcome in it. No home is so humble that her presence is not cheerfully greeted in it. She is a past-master in the art of making friends. As the magnet places the steel filings under its magic influence, so this gentle lady grips the hearts of those around her in bonds of sincere affection. This is a wonderful art and we may all exercise it and all have it in some degree. For whom have you reserved your sweetest smiles and your most tender words of endearment? Is it for those only who are able to help you? Is your smile and your affectionate word only the prompting of incarnate selfishness?

Would that, in your social capacity, you could live for the glory of God! There is a beautiful story told about the famous Judge Carter of New England. When he was a young lawyer he was living in Maine. He and his wife at that time were energetically devoted to Sunday School work. But try as he would he could not bring into the Sunday School some of the poorer children. Their parents did not have money enough to buy shoes for their children, and they did not want the feelings of the little ones to be hurt by being the only shoeless children in the school. So Judge Carter thought the matter out. He went to his own boys and girls and said, "Children, I would like you to go barefooted to Sunday School; it is not to save the shoes and stockings, but to save the feelings of some other children." Then the poorer neighbors said, "If Squire Carter can afford to let his children go to Sunday School barefooted we can afford to let ours go also." So the poorer children sat every Sunday side by side with the rich. That was

A Beautiful Thing to Do

It was worthy of a follower of Him who made himself of no reputation. Are we men of that kind in our intercourse with our fellows? Are we willing to go barefooted for Christ's sake? Are we willing to associate with the poor? Are we ready to spend our lives in trying to help our fellow men to the Cross? In your daily intercourse with your fellow men are you living for God? How are you different from the man of the world in his social intercourse with his fellow men?

Leaving this subject, let me ask how we differ from the world in our financial relations. There is an old proverb which says: "When you touch a man's pocketbook, then you find that man's heart is turned to stone." So, too often, when you touch a man's pocketbook, then you find his love for God is turned to stone. The Bible represents Satan as saying that a man will give everything for his life. That is true in one sense but false in another. For too often a man will surrender not only his earthly life but his spiritual life for gold.

Here, for instance, is a merchant down in his store. For years he has been a slave to business. He always talks poor because he is always putting his money back into the business. The store grows larger and larger. Now it takes in half a block. "What are you working for, merchant? To make a larger business? What is the good of that? Have you not enough money saved up to live upon?" "Oh, yes. I can never spend all I have. But I have a pride in my work. I must keep on increasing the size of my business." So year by year he works. He never thinks of the spiritual welfare of his employees. He never thinks of the good he could do with his money. He never identifies himself with any philanthropic movement, for which his business training has so marvelously fitted him. But he works on piling up his gold, until his health begins to break. One day he goes to the doctor and the physician says, "My friend, if you do not stop working you will die." "Then die I must," he answers, "for my business is my life." Are you to-day in your devotion to business doing any differently from the Pharisees and the publicans? In what way have you ever let your money redound to the cause of Christ? Show me any difference if you can between yourself and the selfish, mercenary man of the world. There is absolutely none.

Gold the Rival of God

You say that your love for gold does not diminish your love for God. Well, we will grant this, if you will answer aright two or three questions: For some years I have heard you denounce some of the leading financiers of our great trusts or business monopolies as a collection of thieves and robbers. You say these men have done more to debauch our legislatures and judiciary and to undermine the moral and spiritual life of our country than any other single means during the last century. Suppose you had grounds for your statement, and that what you said was true. The highwayman who places the pistol to the forehead of the pedestrian and demands that he surrender his all is not more of a scoundrel than is the man at the head of a monopoly who crushes the opposition of his rival; but now that he is between the millstones himself, who has your sympathy?

But though the evils of these trust monopolies may be all that you depict, answer me this question: Suppose that to-day one of these trust magnates should offer to give you stock in his company worth $200,000, would you take it? Then suppose this stock paid an annual dividend of thirty per cent., would you at once dispose of it because it was made out of the wreck of other fortunes? Or, take another illustration: suppose next Sunday morning by breaking the laws of the Sabbath day, you could sell a piece of real estate and make $1,500 on the deal, would you stay away from the house of God in order to do it? How is your life different, in a financial way, from that of the man of the world? If you could make enough money thereby, would you not be willing to compromise your public pledges to your Lord Jesus Christ?

Christian Patriotism

But there is another question I wish to ask: What are you doing as a Christian patriot? How are you different from the men of the world in this respect? Are you thinking of your country only as a social organism whose business it is to protect you and care for you and benefit you? Or are you thinking of it and planning for it as a great Christian government which can protect all its own and be a mighty international power which can help draw all the race to Christ?

Even from the standpoint of the nation you can honor or dishonor the cross of Christ. Take for instance the Asiatic immigration question, which is upheaving the Pacific Coast—and mark you, I am not to-day simply alluding to the Asiatic immigration into the United States only, for Canada is in the same crisis. "Stop those Japanese and Chinamen and Hindus coming into Vancouver!" cry the British colonists. "Stop those Japanese and Chinamen coming into the Golden Gate!" cry Washington and Oregon and California." Why, why, why stop them? "Oh," answers the Caucasian race, "they will overrun us like rats. They will crowd our laborers to the wall. This is a white man's country, to be inhabited only by white men." But is this a white man's country to be saved only for white men? What do you think Jesus Christ would say, if he were asked about this immigration problem? Do you believe he would say, "Send your merchantmen and soldiers to foreign lands. England and Germany and France and America, fight among yourselves for the Asiatic trade; but keep all the Asiatics out of your own lands"?

Welcome to the Asiatic

Come, let me put this question in another way: You are ready to grant that the best civilizing evangelists the world has ever seen are the men who have given themselves up as foreign missionaries. I defy you to find one great missionary in the whole world, who does not strongly advocate the idea that the more foreigners you can get to immigrate into Christian lands, the sooner the world will be converted to Christ. "Open your schools to them. Open your colleges to them. Open your churches to them, and Christ will soon reign supreme over the whole world," says the Presbyterian Missionary Board in New York, and the Congregational Missionary Board in Boston, and the Methodist Missionary Board in Philadelphia. Now, my brother, I want to ask you, if all the great missionary leaders are advocating the conversion of foreign lands by bringing the Chinese and the Japanese and the Hindus to our own lands, dare we, can we fight this immigration problem simply upon the dollar question and not upon the broad ground of Christian brotherhood as manifested by Christ's Cross?

Or take another view of this question of Christian citizenship: Here is the liquor problem which confronts us on every hand. There is not a judge in the criminal courts of the United States who will not declare that over ninety per cent. of all the criminals brought into the courts are brought there, directly or indirectly, through

The Effect of Drink

A majority of the murders, the crimes of this land can be traced, directly or indirectly, to the poison of the intoxicating cup. Are you trying to fight this evil as a Christian citizen? Are you drinking your wine and beer when you are out in social gatherings, as so many are accustomed to do? When the men who have the political slogan, "Free America! Free from the shackles of intemperance!" enter the political arena, do you vote for them and work for them? I am stating a self-evident truth when I declare that the members of the American churches can solve the problem if they will all work together for the freedom of our beloved land from the domination of the saloon.

But again I ask, how are you different from the man of the world in your domestic relations? I am not asserting for one instant that your home is not outwardly a Christian home. I believe you have quite a and extending courtesies would cause an international coldness that would take much explanation between the Departments of State and the Navy Departments of the two countries to straighten out. The American officers can be depended on to see that the reputation of America and American officials for hospitality will not suffer.

The question of coal supply is one to which the Navy Department has given much thought. Each battleship or cruiser has room for many hundreds of tons in her own bunkers, but the great furnaces eat into the supply at an alarming rate and every little while the bunkers have to be refilled from the coal supply ships. As the government has not a sufficient number of regular colliers, a number of merchant colliers will be hired from private concerns for the cruise.

A large war vessel of the battleship or cruiser class, while lying at anchor in port, burns twenty-five tons a day; when steaming at from ten to twelve knots an hour the furnaces burn up one hundred and thirty tons in the twenty-four hours. If the vessels are being forced along at full speed, each ship consumes between four and five hundred tons a day. The estimate has been made that Admiral Evans' fleet will burn ten thousand tons when going at full speed, and thirty-two hundred and fifty tons when going at the twelve-knot rate.

Secretary of the Navy Metcalf has made the preparation for the review of the fleet by President Roosevelt in Hampton Roads on December 16. It was the first intention to have the President review the ships as they lay at anchor, following the plan adopted at the review that opened the Jamestown Exposition. Now it is arranged that he will review the fleet as they pass out of Hampton Roads into the open sea.

President Roosevelt will leave Washington the day before, making the trip on the Mayflower, which will fly the blue presidential flag at her masthead. Mrs. Roosevelt will also go. In the party will be the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Metcalf and several admirals and officials of the Navy Department and their wives.

As soon as the Mayflower is anchored, Rear Admiral Evans, commander of the fleet, and the several flag officers will go on board to make an official call on the President. After them will come the commanding officers of the ships. As soon as they return the fleet will get under way. The Mayflower will lead it until off one of the capes. Then she will turn, facing the line as the ships pass by. Each warship as it comes abreast of the Mayflower will fire the presidential salute.

One of the officers of the battleship fleet, it is interesting to note, is a son of Admiral Evans, and the resemblance between the two is most striking.

The little flotilla of destroyers, comprising the Truxton, the Lawrence, the Hopkins, the Whipple, the Hull and the Stewart, are already on their way. They will join the fleet of battleships at Rio de Janeiro, in South America. They were all overhauled in the repair shops of the Norfolk Navy Yard before leaving. All, with the exception of the Whipple and Truxton, have been supplied with fine new batteries of six pounder guns, and new mounts for the pieces. A full supply of ammunition and provisions was sent to Norfolk and distributed to the destroyers shortly before they sailed.

The commander of this little fleet is Lieutenant Cone, who commanded the Dale when the first flotilla of destroyers sailed to the Philippine Islands several years ago. He is considered by the Navy Department at Washington as an experienced and capable officer.

Warships Fitting Out at The Brooklyn Navy Yard

The destroyers, with the tankship Arethusa, left Hampton Roads and poked their noses into the blue billows of the Atlantic several days ago. The first run will be one of five days, which will bring them into the harbor of San Juan, 1,280 knots from Norfolk. Here they will stay for five days more, while enough coal is taken on board to supply the place of that used during the first run. The coal-bunkers will be refilled at every opportunity.

The second run will be 1,780 knots to Trinidad. At about the moment when the destroyers are letting go their anchors here, far back at their starting-point the great battleships will be pulling the hooks of theirs out of the mud as they get under way for the review and departure. The great battleships and cruisers will steam faster and overtake the entrance flotilla. The destroyers again stop for coal at Pernambuco about the first week of the new year, and it is expected that the entire squadron will pass Cape St. Roque about [illegible]. It is not at all probable that the fleets will sight each other, as the destroyers, being comparatively light in draft, keep close to the shore; while the battleships, disregarding the highest white crested combers, sail far out at sea. They will, however, know each other's exact location by wireless telegraphy. When the flotilla and the battleships meet at Rio Janeiro, the men will be given a holiday on shore. Again the flotilla will be given the start, this time of twenty four hours. The flotilla has stops scheduled at Montevideo, Punta Arenas, Talcahuano, Callao, Panama and Acapulco. It will arrive at the naval rendezvous in Magdalena Bay about the end of the first week in April.

The bay is in Mexican territory, but Secretary Root of the American State Department has made arrangements with President Diaz and the Mexican Secretary of State, to rent a station there for at least three years.

The people of our Western Coast States are looking forward with great interest to the approaching visit of "our fleet from the other side," as they call it. It is expected that all of the large cities, notably San Francisco, will make much of the event. The Californians say that if the battleships can be so altered as to burn oil instead of coal, then the ships that remain for any length of time can be operated at a small cost to the Naval Department. California has a plentiful supply of natural oil, and as an experiment, the monitor Wyoming is being changed from a coal burner to an oil burner, at the Navy Yard at Mare Island. It is believed that the change will be found to be an advantage. Of course, a warship has this difficulty, compared with a merchantman: the fuel has to be so placed that it will not become a menace to the ship if exploded into battle. A shell piercing even a small oil tank and exploding, might cause immeasurable damage.

The ships will probably touch at the naval stations on the Pacific Coast, and take on supplies from San Francisco, Mare Island and Puget Sound. It is hoped that a large number of skilled mechanics will be drawn to the yards on the Pacific Coast, for the Naval Department has work that is far behind for want of proper workmen to complete. The yards on the Atlantic coast will lay off, it is reported, over ten thousand men after the departure of the fleet, and some of these are signing to go to the yards on the Pacific Coast.

umber of Bibles in your house. Sometimes you have amily prayers. But the question I ask is this: How re you bringing up your children? You are getting toether every dollar you can to spend in their education. ou are so anxious about them that some of you are ven educating your children's feet as well as their eads. Each week you send them to dancing-school, that they can do everything society people are exected to do.

Let us turn and study your boy. He is a fine felw, strong, well built and brainy. He has always ood up well in his classes. Then he has a wonderful ower in speech. He is a born orator. Then in addion to all these characteristics he has inherited your other's deep religious nature. You never heard him ll a falsehood. You never knew him to do a conmptible thing. He is always kind, gentle and manly. ou know it would only take a little urging on your rt to land him in the ministry. Would you like him to a minister? Would you have him go out as a home issionary in the lumber camps of the West? Would u want him to work night and day as your father did o was a minister, and then be criticized and found ult with and live all his life on a salary that a od mechanic would despise? No. Why not? You ofess the religious life is the happiest. Why do you t want your boy to take it up? Somehow your proession of Christ and your action toward your boy do t seem to blend.

Then there is that daughter of yours. The other day she startled you with the question, "Mother, would you let me go into the slums and do settlement work? I am sure I could do a lot of good." Why did you not give your consent? There are your two children with very little urging ready to give themselves up to Christian work. You profess to believe that the Christian life is the happiest of all lives. Are you any different in your ambitions for your children from the men and the women of the world in reference to their children?

I was mightily impressed with this fact the other day, when attending a missionary meeting. I think that without any doubt the best women of every church—I mean the most spiritual-minded—are gathered each month in our missionary societies. That day they were giving a farewell reception to a beloved Christian worker. She was not only the most beloved, but without doubt the most brilliant lady speaker I have ever heard in California. For some years she had labored in Asia, and then she returned to her own country on account of broken-down health. Her health having been restored, she heard of a little mining camp in one of our Western States where there was no Young Woman's Christian Association established. She also heard that in this rough mining camp quite a number of young girls had gone wrong because they had no one to look after them. So this brilliant young woman volunteered to go to that mining camp and care for those young girls. We were bidding her good-by. She went without a dollar of salary and entirely alone. She left all her friends and associations behind. As I looked at the well-dressed ladies at that reception, who came from some of the best families in the city, I said, "I wonder how many of us would be glad to surrender our daughters to God's service and have them do what that young woman is going to do?"

Oh, my friends, it is so easy to cry in holy raptures over the sacrifices Christian heroes and heroines have made for the Master; but the great question for us to decide is: How are we different from the men of the world in our ambitions and hopes for our children? Are we really different in our households from the publicans and the Pharisees?

Becoming a Christian is something more than merely signing your name upon the church roll. It means this: Are you willing in the home, in the store, in your patriotism and in your social intercourse with your fellow men, absolutely to surrender your life to Christ and live first and last and all the time for his glory and the good of mankind? That is a very wide, sweeping promise to make, but that is what Christ wants you to do. Are you ready to make your profession amount to something? Are you ready to make it amount to something now?

INDIA FACING A NEW FAMINE

All Crops Fail in the Central Provinces, and Government Relief Work Has Already Begun

FOR several months past letters from India have been filled with forebodings of crop failure throughout a very large part of that country. Hopeful, even when all signs were unfavorable, the people still expected the wished-for rain to come and restore the parched earth. Their hopes were doomed to cruel disappointment. Rains have failed almost completely in the Upper India region, the result being the burning out of the crops, and the imminent reduction of a very large part of the population to destitution. The territory affected, which is shown in the map printed on this page, is a vast and populous one.

Anticipating this disaster, the Indian government has already established relief works in several of the provinces. We give below letters received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from leading missionaries, whose accurate and extensive knowledge of the situation invests their communications with especial timeliness and value.

Rev. W. H. Stephens, of Poona, India, formerly Secretary of our India Missionary Famine Committee, writes to Dr. Klopsch:

"With deep regret I notice the certainty of another severe famine in upper India, Rajputana, Kathiawar, Delhi, the greater part of the Punjab, Central Provinces, Gujerat and other parts of the Bombay Presidency. The usually needed rains in these parts during the latter part of September have entirely failed and the crop is doomed in consequence. I have personally seen, on my way to Upper India, last week, most of the affected areas and the burnt fields, and the look of hunger on the faces of the populace grieved me much. The earth in these parts, in fact, has turned into stone through dryness, and I think no amount of hard labor could reduce it to sand, unless watered for some time. The government has already opened relief works. It grieves us much to contemplate the existing sad state of affairs and the serious evils that may follow. The poor people have already been reduced to penury, through having had to pay scarcity prices for grain for a considerable time, and now starvation is their lot.

"Dear Dr. Klopsch, I need not make any request, but simply leave the above circumstances to your benevolent consideration and decision and that of your readers. I refrained from bringing the circumstances to your notice earlier, hoping that the long deferred rain might still come down and save the extreme situation somewhat; but alas! it failed."

Rev. J. W. Robinson, of the M. E. Church in southern Asia, writes from Lucknow, October 19, to Rev. W. H. Stephens, as follows:

"In almost the entire Upper India region there has been great scarcity for the past two years, and the people are in no condition to meet changes which have developed during the last month. The monsoon was more than a month late in arriving, and withdrew a full month earlier than usual, with the result that all kharif crops are burned out. In the districts of Oudh, most of Rohilkhand, most of the Punjab, Rajputana, and many parts of the Central Provinces the crops are destroyed, and as no rain has fallen it has been impossible to sow for the rabi crops. Prices are in most of these parts already as high as they were in the worst part of the 1896-97 famine, and the failure of the crops leaves the people without the usual work of harvesting the kharif and sowing the rabi, by which they live.

"Mother Bird" and Her Bowery Boys

WHEN "Mother Bird" talks to the "boys" at the Bowery Mission services, the "boys" listen. There is something compelling in the gentle, simple words, the sympathy and understanding. At first the listener thinks what a remarkable gift this woman has for the work she is doing. Then he realizes that only out of the heart could proceed such a hopeful, loving message.

There is something strangely impressive—depressing at times—in that crowd of faces upturned to the platform. Most of them are like maps upon which one can trace the downward course of lives once worthily lived. Some are alert, comprehending what is being said; others are dazed; a few sleep, drugged with weariness or hunger.

Singing rouses the Mission audience and they join in the hymns with a will, many seeming to know them. They listen quietly and with attention to the simple, earnest prayer, and when requests for special prayers are asked for, some are ready to rise. Others there are unquestionably who really wish to ask; but a curious resistance holds them in their places. It is the same later in the evening when the request for "experiences" is made.

"Are you ready to give your hearts to Christ?" It is a searching question and few the world over are prepared to answer quickly.

The thought of dear ones—a latent, unselfish instinct—brings some to their feet in answer to the question for special prayers. "My mother, my brother, my sister, my wife, my children" is heard throughout the audience.

The more one sees of the Mission work, the more he is impressed with the Christian courage of those who are doing it. To be faithful and hopeful amidst such darkness, to labor and pray unceasingly, despite the discouragements and the failures, to keep feeding the hungry and casting bread upon the waters unquestioningly and uncomplainingly—surely this is laboring in the vineyard. Certainly, it is being faithful over a few things. How small a thing it is to give them the support they need, when they give themselves!

Mrs. Bird Leading a Converts' Meeting at the Mission

Churches, hospitals, institutions work each in its place to help and uplift humanity, but none more earnestly than those who go down into the waste of degradation and despair, and struggle to bring the drowning men to shore. Yet such work, although so full of, and demanding as it does great self-sacrifice, by no means goes unrewarded. The testimonies given any one night at a Bowery Mission service would repay all the efforts that have been put forth there. Perhaps there are only a dozen or more testimonies in an evening, but they are remarkable ones. One has been kept a few days from drink, another a few weeks, months or years. Several have been wholly regenerated and their appearance proves their words. There is a cleanliness about them which is more than soap and water or clothes, and this result has come not by force of will or by mere signing the pledge, but because they have touched the hem of the healing robe.

One night recently, a young Swede got up from his seat just under the platform, and began to talk. He had been drinking heavily, and there was a murmur of disapproval from the men.

"I had some money this morning," the young fellow walled, "and I was all right; now I've got five cents. Oh, there ain't nothin' in it, nothin' in it!"

"Listen to him, boys," Mrs. Bird said, rising, "and look at him. There is an object lesson for you. You see what liquor will do. I am glad the poor boy spoke."

At great cost he had learned his lesson—if he will only remember it—if all the children of men could but wake to realize that "there ain't nothin' in it"—in sin, in degradation, in the revel of the drunkard.

After the services are over each evening, the men are fed with coffee and bread, remaining in their seats while the food is passed to them. For many it is the first food of the day.

Some doubtless have come there in order to get it; but their hunger and thirst are a type of that deeper starvation which can be satisfied only with the Bread of Life, and the milk of the Word.

How the Filipinos View Independence

FEW Americans have a clear understanding of the governmental system in the Philippines. While these islands, under American rule, have made remarkable progress, to an outsider their politics seem so complex, and their factions so numerous and so active, that it is difficult to arrive at any proper comprehension of the situation without considerable study. Fortunately, the means of enlightenment are at hand in a recent address delivered before the Lake Mohonk Conference by the Hon. Paul Charlton, an official of the Bureau of Insular Affairs and an authority on the Philippines. Mr. Charlton said:

"On April 1, 1907, the Governor General issued a proclamation calling a general election for July 30. Long before the day set for the election, political agitation of an intensity only possible among a people of the racial characteristics and tropical habitat of the Filipinos, was prosecuted throughout the islands. The five factions gave voice to their views. The one question in the discussion appeared to be 'Independence.'

'On the one hand were ranged the 'Nacionalistas'—the extremists—who stated that they wanted 'urgent,' 'electric,' and 'immediate' independence. This faction contains men of undoubted ability and purity of motive; but among its main spokesmen are many demagogues, disappointed office-seekers, and persons who, having had military prominence in the two insurrections, unwilling to practise the arts of peace, have, until now, found themselves out of the lime-light, and with a passion for notoriety, were willing to make any promise or commitment that would advance their candidacy. Their greatest spokesman was Dr. Gomez, who was elected delegate from Manila by a plurality of less than fifty over his moderate opponent, Dr. Lukban. He was quite familiar with practical politics during a residence of seven years in Spain and Cuba, in the employ of the Spanish Government as an army contract surgeon. He is not now a citizen of the Philippine Islands, and has not taken the oath of allegiance. His faction contains men of undoubted probity and ability.

"Affiliated with the 'Nacionalistas,' but less radical are the 'Independentes,' 'Inmediatistas,' and 'Independistas,' all of whom demand immediate independence. They represent the shade of public opinion analogous to our 'Gold Democrats.' The 'Progresistas' or Federalists, are those who, recognizing the great beneficent and unselfish work of this people to theirs, are supporters of the Government policies. They appear to have relied too strongly on the appreciation of their people, and consequently their representation in the Assembly is small compared with the allied representatives of the policy of immediate independence, or even with the 'Nacionalistas' alone.

"The election resulted in the choosing of eighty members, of whom thirty-one are 'Nacionalistas'; thirty represent the 'Independentes', Inmediatistas' and 'Independistas,' and sixteen are 'Progresistas.' The Government stood absolutely aloof from the elections. It made provision to maintain order at the polls, but no interference was necessary.

"A careful and thorough reading of the native press since the election is convincing that our Filipino political brother is like some of his American prototypes in considering pre-election promises and programmes as platforms, that is, things to get in on and not to stand on. Various victorious candidates who had been making promises always, including 'immediate' and 'complete independence', and sometimes also 'no taxes' and 'an acre and a mule,' are now exclaiming that what they meant was that they would advocate independence and liberal treatment for their constituents.

"The government of the Philippine Islands will convene and continue this assembly because of its conviction that the Filipino people, as a people, recognize the beneficent work that is being done for them, in universal opportunity for primary and secondary education; in trade and technical training; in local self-government in all the provinces and municipalities for almost eight years; in great public works of sanitation, road building and harbor improvement; in providing convenient courts for the speedy and impartial administration of justice; and in the maintenance of public order by a constabulary recruited from their own people, which has made life, liberty and property safe to the remotest ends of the islands. The fact that a few demagogues, by facile words and specious promises, have seated themselves in the Assembly, is no more ground for saying that this people will be unfit for self government in a hundred years, than does the presence of a few men of like class and character in every municipal, State, and even the Federal legislature in the United States form the fair basis for a like criticism on the political capacity of the American people.

"When local self-government in the municipalities and provinces was in its experimental stage, it required some education to prove to the presidentes, caciques and ilustrisima that government could and must be carried on without oppression or bribes, and with integrity and impartiality. That lesson has been learned, and nowhere in continental America is local self-government conducted with more economy and fairness and with less oppression and jobbery than in the Philippine Islands.

Revising Christmas Festivities.

NOT a little regret is felt in the Christian community at the necessity for changing the character of the Christmas songs, hitherto sung in the public schools of New York. We are told that it is a necessity, because the Jews object to any mention of Christ, or even reference to him, in connection with the festival. There are many Jewish children in the public schools, being educated with Christian children at the public cost, and care must be taken that their prejudices and those of their parents are not outraged. So the song-books are being revised, and every reference to Him whose birth we celebrate at Christmas is being carefully expunged. It is a high price to pay for the privilege of having the Jews among us, but the authorities appear to think it must be paid.

It is rather ungracious on the part of the Jews to make the demand, and we are astonished to see that some intelligent rabbis are prominent spokesmen in pressing it. They have been telling us for a long time that Jesus taught nothing but what Judaism had taught, so there really seems no serious ground for so strenuously objecting to the references to him at such a period. Besides, Jesus being a Jew, they might be expected to be proud of the homage paid to him by the whole nation. They constitute numerically not more than a fifth of the population of the city, and therefore might have yielded to the inclinations of their more numerous fellow citizens. Even in London, when a Jew was Lord Mayor, the Jews raised no objections to the Christian manner of observing the season. But here, probably the only country on earth where they could bring pressure to bear, the country in which hospitality to them is most lavishly displayed, they show something not far removed from intolerance.

There seems a kind of timidity, too, about the demand. They cannot imagine that any attempt at proselyting would be made in the public schools. Their children are under control of the parents for the greater part of the day and on Saturdays and Sundays. Do they distrust their power of keeping them faithful to their religion, or doubt their ability to counteract the influence of such remote references to Christ? Scanning the countenances of the children of the Hebrew race as they pour out of the schools on the East Side of the city, it would seem to the observer that none of them would be made worse by imbibing even direct teaching about Jesus. But that is not suggested or advocated. The peace on earth and good will to men associated with his birth and most frequently recalled at Christmas are not the lessons the Jew has cause to dread. His danger consists in those lessons being forgotten and the fierce passions born of race hostility and of business rivalry being engendered, as they have been in Russia and elsewhere. We think the Jews are blind to their own interests in this matter, and, in their demand that the American people shall forget Christ at such a time, are sowing seed that may grow to a harvest that they understand only too well.

What is Happiness?

A DISTINGUISHED young Englishwoman, Miss Laurence Alma-Tadema, daughter of the famous painter, is now paying us a visit, but not as an ordinary tourist or curiosity-hunter. Miss Alma-Tadema is the apostle of a new and attractive philosophy—she comes to tell us how to be happy. Like many other young enthusiasts, she has formulated a theory of her own, such as only the heart and mind of youth could have conceived. It is, in brief, to control yourself, work hard, and develop all your intellectual and physical powers to their fullest capacity.

While this advice contains nothing new—and carries with it a reminiscence of the days when the buoyant heart of youth rejoiced in the essays of Emerson and Carlyle—it will hardly be accepted by our prosaic world as altogether satisfying. It is true that in work for art's sake, or with some high ideal in view, there is a deeper satisfaction than in purposeless effort, or in work for mere gain. But as to lofty ideals, and strenuous self-development for some great purpose, which are apparently essentials in Miss Alma-Tadema's scheme, though these are familiar expressions in a certain class of literature, they are too often, and inevitably, forgotten in the stress and hurly-burly of real life.

Our graceful English philosopher rightly holds externals to be secondary and that happiness is not a thing of the pocket-book, the toilet, the table, elegant surroundings, expensive pleasures, or, as Rousseau expressed it, "a good bank account, a good cook, a good digestion." One must be sufficient unto one's self, she declares, and in this sufficiency she holds that true happiness lies. There are many who will differ from this conclusion, which is simply an echo of the ancient Stoic philosophy. But no one has ever thought of the imperturbable Stoics as examples of happiness, the true "sunshine of the soul."

Where, then, does the road to happiness lie? Is it "beyond the purple hills," far away and tantalizingly out of human reach, or is it hidden somewhere near at hand? There is no royal road, else the great would travel it and ordinary mortals be forbidden. Many have searched the whole world in vain for it, like the melancholy prince in the story, who, when he had abandoned the search and returned home, resigned to God's will and resolved to be content and to live the simple life and share the innocent pleasures of his peasant subjects, found happiness smiling at him over his shoulder, an unexpected but welcome guest. The moral of the tale would seem to be that happiness consists in doing our duty, whatever our station, conscientiously and with right good will; in being kindly disposed to others, generous and forgiving, and in leaving the result of all our efforts in God's hands, knowing that he loves us and will care for us. The soul thus fortified can smile at misfortune and be happy even in adversity.

The Motto on the Coinage

SHOULD the reverent and time-honored motto, "In God We Trust," recently dropped from the face of our national coins, be restored? or is it the sense of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it should remain eliminated and that an acknowledgment of the Deity is out of place on the coinage of this republic?

We invite not only the readers of this journal, but all who regard this question as one of national importance, to write us briefly, giving their judgment as to the proper course to be taken under the circumstances. Congress will meet shortly, and the motto on the coinage will probably come before it for urgent consideration.

Public opinion is one of the most potent agencies of which civilization knows. This is an opportunity for every one to aid in the general enlightenment on this question, which involves much more than the motto itself. Write your views briefly, not exceeding two hundred words, and send them to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for publication. You may thus be helping to make a part of the nation's history.

The Rest Cure

FROM Roumania comes the report that the king has been ordered by his physicians to take what they designate as the "two weeks' rest cure." The king has been ordered to remain in bed for two weeks and rest, thinking as little as possible about affairs of state. It is expected that exhausted body and shattered nerves will be restored by this method as by no other.

The king is one of the most kindly and progressive monarchs of the world. He is somewhat advanced in years, and insurrections several months ago caused him much anxiety.

It is only recently that people heard much of the rest cure. It has been prescribed for many people who take it in many different ways. Most of them believe it to mean that they should vary for a time their usual occupation. President Roosevelt takes a rest by working just as hard as ever, but in a new way, by tramping over hills, hunting, and riding. Many of our foremost business men, when tired with the strain of numerous enterprises, find "rest" in golf or the various activities of country life. Probably some of them may work harder than in their ordinary vocation, as did one pale and weak individual who was greeted by a friend on his return with an anxious inquiry as to whether he had been ill. "No," was the feeble reply, "I have not been ill, I have been on a vacation."

A little more moderation both in work and play is what a majority of our active business men need, if their activity is not to be of comparatively short duration. "Rush" seems to be the one idea of American life, and it has taken hold in some measure on life in the Old World, greatly to the disadvantage of both. The "rest cure" is unpleasant medicine for an active man to take, but it seems to be in store for many of us unless we cease burning up our energy faster than nature can supply it.

A Request from Dr. Klopsch

I APPEAL to all of our subscribers who would like to be of real assistance to an exceptionally busy man, to help me at this time.

This they can do by renewing their subscriptions as early as convenient, thus enabling me to distribute over a more protracted term the pressure usually incident to the holiday season. Such a course prevents congestion in our Subscription and Premium Departments. In co-operating with me to this extent, the advantage resulting is altogether mutual. It affords me opportunity to personally direct prompt shipment of premiums, and it insures the delivery of these premiums, changes of date, etc., before the great holiday rush interferes with the express, mail and subscription service.

It goes without saying that an early renewal does not entail any loss on the subscriber, since the new subscription date is advanced one year from the present date of expiry.

The first editions of our premiums and calendars, always the best, are now ready. Shipment can be made at once, and prompt delivery is at this time practically assured. Later on, the congestion of facilities is very likely to cause irritating delays.

Heretofore I have always been favored with the heartiest co-operation of our subscribers, who thus greatly facilitated the prompt handling of our holiday trade, and I feel confident that the present year will prove no exception to the rule.

Thanking you in advance for any help you may afford me in this matter, and grateful for past favors, I am, very cordially yours,

THE DISASTROUS EARTHQUAKE IN CALABRIA, ITALY

Earthquake Sufferers

LATER details of the catastrophe in Calabria, Italy, have come to hand since the cabled report published in these columns on November 13. They show that the first accounts by no means exaggerated the devastation. The town of Ferruzzano, which was completely wiped out, was built on a rocky eminence, which was split across by the force of the earthquake. A wide chasm was formed, into which the buildings on both sides were precipitated. A correspondent, who visited the town soon after the shocks, writes: "Where streets once stood, only heaps of wreckage are now to be seen; tottering walls show where houses had been, and in some places fragments of roofs caught by some projection, are suspended in mid-air as if by some miracle of equilibrium." In all about six hundred persons were killed, including many women and children. By a melancholy coincidence the calamity occurred on the very day set for the inauguration of two new villages built in the district by philanthropists of Milan and Turin to accommodate the people rendered homeless by the earthquake two years before. A cable dispatch dated November 18 reports a renewal of the shocks on that day. They caused great consternation to a group of people who had returned to the village to try to recover some of the property buried in the ruins of their homes. They fled precipitately to the country, where many are now camped in the open air. Some subterranean grottoes are crowded to overflowing with the refugees. Men and women, rich and poor, soldiers and priests are huddled together in these shelters. The Milan Relief Committee has undertaken the erection of a hundred temporary houses to shelter those who are sick, the aged and the children. It is a kind and thoughtful act, which will bring upon them the blessing of Him who said:

He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed: for he giveth of his bread to the poor. (Prov. 22: 9.)

Cause of a Wreck

A telegram from Ottawa, Canada, reports that a steamer of the Portland Oriental route has become a wreck on Emory Island, near Vancouver. The crew got off safely, but the steamer is firmly aground, and its forward part is so deeply submerged that it is practically full of water. A curious feature of the wreck is that it is uncertain whether it occurred in Canadian or United States waters. It is said to be lying directly on the international boundary line. There is a rumor, not confirmed, that the cause of the wreck was due to the hurry of the officers to reach Vancouver. It is customary to take a pilot on board at Victoria, but in this instance the steamer did not stay there and came on under the guidance of the skipper. That may be an incorrect report, but we know that the moral wrecks of life too often proceed from that cause. Men do not accept the guidance which is freely offered to them, but prefer to trust in their own guidance and learn too late how inadequate that is.

O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. (Jer. 10: 23.)

Defective Naturalization

A difficulty in our system of naturalization has arisen in Germany, that is causing some embarrassment. The consular authorities are now declining to register citizens of German birth, with American naturalization papers, who are visiting Germany, unless they can give convincing evidence that they intend to return to the United States and remain here permanently. It is not always possible to furnish such evidence and the visitor is consequently in an anomalous position. His American citizenship is not recognized, because he is not registered at the American consulate, and he is liable to be claimed as a German citizen, or ignored as having no nationality at all. The head of a family who is of German birth, temporarily residing in Germany, where he may be doing business, may find his son, if he happened to be born in Germany, required to perform military service, unless he can furnish proof of his intention to return and live permanently in the United States. The defect will probably be speedily corrected by friendly negotiation. In the spiritual realm, however, an analogous difficulty will always remain. The Christian who returns to the world and devotes himself to its pursuits, finds his allegiance and permanent place regarded as doubtful.

As for such as turn aside to their crooked ways, the Lord shall lead them forth with the workers of iniquity. (Ps. 125: 5.)

Pension for a Life Saver

It is a kind act that Mr. Carnegie has done in conferring a pension on Mrs. Wilson—better known as Ida Lewis—the life saver of Newport, R. I. Fifty years ago she took up her residence as a young girl in the lighthouse known as Lime Rock, in Newport Harbor. At that time her father, Captain Hosea Lewis, was the keeper of the lighthouse, and she became his efficient helper. Her prowess and the courage she displayed in the rescue of drowning men became famous over the country. After the death of her father she was made keeper of the light, and right faithfully has she attended to the duty for over forty years. Thirty years ago the City of Newport recognized her services by presenting her with a fine new boat, with a silver rudder yoke. Mr. Carnegie has now placed her on his private pension list, insuring her thirty dollars a month for life. His generosity will be applauded by all who know of her work. The day is coming when those who do for shipwrecked souls such work as the Newport heroine has been doing for shipwrecked bodies, with her beacon light and her life boat, will receive recognition from God.

Let him know that he who converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. (James 5: 20.)

A Thief's Plea Rejected

A painful scene was enacted in a court in Williamsburg, N. Y., recently. A girl of eighteen fell on her knees to the magistrate and begged him not to send her to prison. The magistrate was visibly affected by her tearful appeal and said he would be merciful if the facts warranted it. The case, however, was strongly against the prisoner. She had been arrested for robbing her employer, in whose house she had served as a domestic. She had been placed in the care of the probation-story officer, who pitied her and took her to her home. Two days later she broke open a trunk belonging to her benefactor and disappeared with a quantity of wearing apparel and some articles of jewelry. After listening to the story the magistrate pronounced her incorrigible and in spite of her tears and protestations sent her to the penitentiary. Even sinners recognize that there are cases in which it is not wise to exercise mercy, yet they persist in hoping that God will overlook the wickedness of those whom mercy has not brought to repentance.

Let favor be shewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness. (Isa. 26: 10.)

Imprisoned by Coal

A young Asiatic is now in the Marine Hospital on Ellis Island, New York, recovering from injuries that came near costing him his life. He comes from a region lying to the north of the Persian Gulf and came to this country on the Umeata, a date-laden steamer. He explained in Arabic to an interpreter that he had heard much of this country and longed to try his fortune here. He crawled on board and hid himself in the coal bunkers. He remained concealed until the steamer reached Port Said, where she stayed to take in more coal. His position was so sheltered that the avalanche of coal that was cast into the bunkers there did not crush him, but it held him prisoner as securely as would the iron door of a vault. Hunger and the scalding air compelled him to make an effort to escape. He worked steadily with his hands to dig a passage out, but found the labor too exhausting. Two of the workers, as they were at their work, heard the man's muffled cries and reported his situation to the captain. All the available force was then employed in digging the man out. The work had to be done carefully, as there was constant danger of the coal shifting. Eventually, after eighteen hours' hard work and the removal of nearly two hundred tons of coal, the man was extricated. His hands were bleeding from his struggles to get himself and his clothes were torn to shreds. He [illegible] owes his life to dressing from the head down and [illegible] for deliverance. If he had continued trying to [illegible] his way out, the coal would have fallen and killed him. His case was like that of [illegible] save himself when [illegible] Christ has wrought for him.

THE FLOOD AND WHAT IT BROUGHT

By Arthur B. Rhinow

THE Ohio rose at the rate of three inches an hour, while the little tributary rushed into the broad stream like a torrent. The old man on the deck of the shanty boat scanned the horizon for a rift. After a brief examination, however, he shook his head.

"Looks like it's going to keep it up for some time yet," he grumbled in a deep voice.

"Over there in the east, the clouds do not look quite so dark, father," replied the girl sitting at his side. She seemed strangely out of place on the old boat. So did her father, who could not altogether disguise the refinement of former days. They had taken refuge on this house-boat because their little farm was flooded.

"We were poor before, Nora," he again broke the silence; "but now we are homeless. We'd have been drowned like rats, if it hadn't been for old Joe getting us."

The old man stared at the relentless current as he spoke. Every word seemed to be uttered with a strain. Nora regarded him with filial solicitude, as she pushed back her chair so as to be better sheltered by the awning. Her eyes were filled with tears.

Old Joe was strumming his banjo. He was oblivious to all danger. He was not afraid of getting wet. To the accompanying splash and rush of rain and river, he hummed and strummed his favorite melodies. The selections were rendered with such pathos, and such a display of uniqueness in improving the original tunes, that the girl could not help smiling. But when he drifted into "Old Kentucky Home," she trembled and quickly glanced at her father.

He looked very sad as he sat there dreaming, his foot beating time to the old air. The song was ended with a fine flourish, and Joe rose to go into the cabin for a nap; but the expression of grief did not fade from the man's old face."

"Yes," he growled, "my old Kentucky home."

"Look at those logs drifting down," Nora remarked as sprightly as her tears would permit.

He did not look. "The idea of cheating a man out of his old homestead; and by his old comrade, too," he muttered.

"Surely, father, the east is growing much brighter."

"Driving an old man from his home, because he's lost a scrap of paper." He shook his fist, rose and stepped out from under the canvas, regardless of the rain.

The girl constrained him to come back, but she could not prevent his hot words.

"And I can swear I paid every cent of it," he continued. "That sickly poltroon knows it, too. I hate him; him and his whole family; he's a liar—"

"Father," she pleaded, "perhaps he is far less happy than you know. Besides, he is sick. And then, you know George is different; he always was good to us." She did not look at her father as she made the last remark.

"How can I care for the son of the man who has wronged me as that scoundrel did?" the father roared.

They were silent. He scowled as he thought of the past; she smiled as she dreamt of the future.

After a while, Nora suddenly jumped up and intently gazed at an object which was being swiftly borne down the smaller stream.

"The old man threw the rope just in time"

"A boat, father," she exclaimed. "Look at that boat! I believe it is in danger of being upset by the logs."

The father looked, quickly rose to his feet, and took in the situation with eyes that age had scarcely made less keen.

"The fool has lost his oars," he muttered. "If the logs hit him, his nobby boat will surely keel over. Seems to me I know him; do you?"

As he turned to the girl, he saw that the color had left her cheek.

"It's George, father!" she cried, as he steadied her. "Don't you know him?"

The father looked again, just in time to see the boat capsize. He had recognized the face, however, and a grim determination took possession of his heart. This was the chance for revenge for all he had suffered.

The girl's shriek roused him from his indifference.

"The current will sweep him right by our boat, father. Quick, the rope!"

The father did not stir.

The girl dragged the coil to the edge of the deck; but it was a heavy rope, and she knew she could not handle it.

"Father," she cried, as she shook him, "get ready to throw the rope. He'll be hurled against something and sink before he can make the shore."

The old man still stood as in a trance.

"Father," she pleaded, "if you love me, you must love him. Don't you understand?"

He started, and gave his child a piercing look. Then he jerked up the rope, whirled it above his head, and threw it, just in time for the young man to take hold.

It was not hard to draw George up on to the deck. He was not a very heavy man, and, besides, Joe now came to the rescue. The girl's shriek had awakened him out of his dreams.

When the sheltering canvas was reached, Nora proved that her words had been true. Her father looked on with a strange mingling of hatred and love. When the young man turned to him, however, his eyes flashed defiant hatred.

"I came down the stream with the intention of seeing you," George began to explain. "When I found your farm flooded, I inquired and was told you had gone to old Joe's house-boat. I suppose you can guess the rest."

"What do you want?" the old man growled, looking at his daughter, his only child.

George drank the hot coffee Nora had quickly prepared for him.

"I came to tell you that father died," he answered, "and that he repented before he closed his eyes. He told me he had suffered a great deal. He handed me the receipt, which he had picked up and kept when one day you dropped it. Here it is; he told me to give it to you. And he asked me to beg you to forgive him, and to think of him as he was in the old days."

The old man took the paper with trembling hand, and sat down. He could not say a word.

George was taken into the cabin, where he made the most of Joe's clothes. Presently, Joe came to tell Nora and her father that the "young feller" wanted to see them. The old man waved consentingly at Nora, but he did not go. Bitter and sweet fought a great battle in his heart. When he finally did stand on the threshold of the cabin, he overheard the lovers' conversation.

"But now I am a poor man," said George; "do you want a poor man?"

The answer was not given in words, although it was distinctly audible. When the old man turned to glance at the sky, he saw that the sun was breaking through the clouds.

THE ONE HE LOVED BEST

"FREDDIE, whom do you love best?"

"You— But, Mamma dear, there's somebody I love best."

"What, somebody you love better than Mamma?"

"Yes," answered Freddie, lingering over the word, and looking earnestly at his mother with great blue eyes, that seemed to ask her not to feel hurt at his preference for another.

"Why, Freddie," she asked, "who is it that you love better than Mamma?"

"Jesus," was the unexpected reply, and the little boy's voice was very sweet as he spoke the name. Then the mother's heart was very glad, for she had often talked with her little ones about this Friend of little children, and she wanted them to love him best of all.

One Sunday evening, about six weeks later, Freddie's mother found under her door a note which read, "Go at once to the hospital. Frederick is very sick." She had seen her boy at noon and had been told that he would undoubtedly get well. He had been sick a couple of days, and this was his first day in the hospital. With all possible speed she went to the hospital and made her way to the ward where her precious child was lying. "How is he?" she inquired of the doctor. "He is a very sick child," was the grave answer. "Does that mean that he will not recover?" she asked. "That is what it means," the doctor replied.

Turning at once to the child, the mother said, "Freddie, do you remember telling Mamma that you loved Jesus best of all?"

"Yes."

"Do you still love him best?"

"Yes," was the reply again, and his tone indicated surprise that Mamma could think it possible that he had faltered in his allegiance.

"Do you want to go and live with him?"

"Yes, I do," and there was no mistaking the sincerity of the little child.

"Well, darling," the mother said, trying to keep her voice bright and cheerful, "you are going to live with him. He has sent for you and you are going to-night, and you will never be sick or unhappy any more."

The child's face lighted up with eager expectation. "Oh," he said, "he lives up in the sky, doesn't he? I want to go right straight up." "Mamma," he said a few minutes later, "I want my shoes on; my feet will get dirty." He would not soil his feet in the weary ascent that he thought was before him. "No darling," his mother finally said, "your feet will not be dirty, for mother will carry you and hand you to Jesus." Then he was afraid that the ice-cap on his head might leave some stain, or that there might be some speck of dirt on his face; he must be perfectly clean when Jesus saw him. His mother reassured him by telling him that he was clean.

Then he would say, in a tired little voice, "It takes such a long time to get up, doesn't it, Mamma?" "I wonder if he will let me in when I get up." "Of course he will let you in, darling," his mother answered, "for he loves you and he has sent for you to come and live with him."

Presently he asked his mother to tell his father to come and live with Jesus. "And you must come, too, Mamma," he added, in a voice that was very bright and happy. "Yes, dear, I will come, too."

For an hour, there was no sound except that of the labored breathing of the little boy. Suddenly, there was profound silence. The beautiful eyes flew open and the expression of rapturous delight, of wonder and awe and perfect love and satisfaction spoke in no uncertain tones to the mother's heart and comforted her as nothing else could have done, as she realized that her darling boy was face to face with the One whom he loved best of all.

A GREAT TEMPERANCE CONVENTION

W. C. T. U. Legions Meet in Nashville A Memorable Week of Meetings

THE thirty-fourth Annual Convention was held in Nashville, Tenn., November 8 to 13, inclusive. About four hundred delegates were present, and there were many friends who came with delegates, who, together with citizens of Nashville, made an audience of several thousand persons attending the evening session of the Convention. It was an auspicious time for the Convention to sit in Nashville, because Tennessee is said to be "going dry." For weeks before the Convention, there was a very lively interest and activity in wiping out the saloons.

The address of Mrs. George Harris Armor, which was about "How Georgia Went Dry," in which many thrilling incidents were told, was listened to with deepest interest, and at the request of citizens was repeated on the evening of November 15, two days after the close of the Convention in the great Auditorium, and was attended by several thousand people.

"Welcome Night" was Friday, November 8. The Auditorium was beautifully decorated with white bunting mingled with the Jackson vine, in graceful festoons, combined with white chrysanthemums. Addresses of welcome were made by Governor Malcolm R. Patterson on behalf of the State; Mayor James S. Brown, for the city; Rev. W. M. Anderson, D.D., representing the churches; Mr. Alfred E. Howell for education; Rev. Ira Landrith for the Anti-Saloon League of Tennessee, and Mrs. Selina Moore Holman as president of the Tennessee W. C. T. U. Miss Anna A. Gordon, vice-president of the National W. C. T. U., replied to the addresses of welcome. Beautiful music added charm to the occasion.

All of the evenings of the Convention were of a popular character, the mornings and afternoons being devoted to business. On the second evening a "diamond medal oratorical contest" was held. There were seven contestants, girls and boys. The prize was awarded to Homer Ramey, of Ohio. The subject of his oration was "The Drink Demon." The third evening, General A. S. Daggett, of the United States Army, made a masterly address on "The Influence of the Sale of Liquor in the Army Canteen." He told how the canteen was started at the port of Vancouver in 1882, without liquor, simply as an amusement place for soldiers who desired to live decent lives. Subsequently, at Fort Omaha, liquor was introduced into the canteen and other posts followed, and, said General Daggett, "When a recruit came to a post where there was a canteen, there was such a pressure on account of this beer influence that few failed to yield. There is a simple remedy for the whole matter. Let the Washington authorities say to-morrow that, all things being equal, preference will be given to the total abstainer, and in a few years' time you will revolutionize the army."

Mrs. Harriet W Brand
Treas. Nat'l W.C.T.U.

The fourth evening was "Platform Night." There were four addresses: Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts' subject was "The Perils of Opium and Intoxicants in the Orient"; Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp spoke on "General Conditions Which Obtain in Temperance Work"; Mrs. Edith Smith Davis, on "Temperance Work Abroad" from the standpoint of scientific temperance instruction; Rev. Anna H. Shaw spoke about "The Ballot for Women."

The fifth evening of the Convention was "Demonstration Night," when a brilliant presentation was made of the good work being done by the Unions. This was made by means of banners, flowers, etc. Toward the support of the work for the next year $6,000 was subscribed. The youngest giver was Hamilton Parker, Jr., of Nashville, three years old, who, walking up to the altar, said in a clear voice, "I will give fifty," and then corrected himself, saying: "No, I will give one hundred."

The closing night of the Convention was "State Jubilee Night," when States making the largest gains in membership were allowed a few minutes each to tell how they did it. The enthusiasm kept up until the President, Mrs. Stevens, pronounced the Thirty-fourth Annual Convention adjourned.

The [illegible] of the Convention will be best understood through a brief epitome of some of the resolutions passed:

1. [illegible] 2. [illegible] 3. [illegible] 4. [illegible] 5. [illegible] the traffic in girls, both importation and exportation, for immoral purposes. 6. An amendment to the Constitution prohibiting polygamy within the territory of the United States. 7. A petition to Congress for a law against the importation into or manufacture within the United States of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes in all territory now or hereafter under the jurisdiction of the United States.

All-day evangelistic services were held on a day preceding the Convention, and every day at twelve o'clock the proceedings were halted for "noonside prayer" and evangelistic services under the direction of Miss Elizabeth W. Greenwood, National Evangelistic Superintendent.

Souls Won in Highways and Byways

AN aggressive Gospel mission work is carried on at 269 and 271 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City. Every night open-air and indoor services are held, and on Wednesdays a Women's Meeting and a Children's Service are conducted. On Sunday there are services at 10:30 A.M. and 4 P.M., besides a wide-awake Sunday School in the afternoon. Mrs. Clemme Ellis White is the enthusiastic superintendent of this busy West Side mission. For a number of years Mrs. White has conducted this work and she is ably aided by her husband in all her efforts. West Side homes are visited, many persons are helped to better lives, and cases of real need are ministered to by these busy workers.

There have been some encouraging spiritual results of the work. One elderly woman, now living at a considerable distance, frequently comes to the mission to express her gratitude to God for the change which has so transformed her that she is known as the "happy woman." She induced her sister-in-law to come with her, and the latter brought her brother, who had been for more than thirty years a drunkard. All are now in the Gospel fold.

Much interest centres in the open-air work, and many men and women count these outdoor services as the turning-point in their lives. A professional gambler, on his periodical visit to the metropolis, was halted by the street service, and gave his heart to God, and then took his way back to his home in another State to tell the long-sorrowing family the good news of his reformation.

All the officers, superintendent, pianist, janitor and others assisting in the work of this mission serve without salary, their labor being rendered gladly for Jesus' sake. Voluntary contributions are applied towards payment of rent and similar expenses, a large proportion of moneys received going to relieve pressing cases of need among the poor and unfortunate.

Questions and Answers

Lester V., Chicago, Ill. In reading Hiawatha, how are we to interpret the Indian names Longfellow gives to his characters?

"Hiawatha" is the Prophet Teacher; "Mudjekeewis," West Wind; "Mishe-Nahma," the Sturgeon; "Minnehaha," Laughing Water; "Mondamin," Maize; "Ponemah," the Land of the Hereafter, etc. You will find an Indian glossary in any good edition.

M. B. P., Salem, Mass. 1. Please state briefly the reasons for believing that Christ was born in B.C. 5. 2. Why is it believed that the ministry of Christ continued three years, when Clement says it was comprised in one year?

1. As we are told in the Gospels that Herod was living and slaughtered the children after Jesus was born (see Matt. 2: 16), and as it is a matter of record that he died in 750 U.C., which corresponds to B.C. 4, it is obvious that Jesus was born before that date. Then on the other side he was born after the decree for the census (Luke 2: 1) was issued. From Tertullian we learn that the decree was issued in 748 and the enrolment began in 749 U.C., which corresponds to B.C. 5. Thus the birth is fixed by those two occurrences. 2. The length of the ministry is fixed by several circumstances, among others by the number of Passovers, as there was never more than one in a year. The first mentioned is John 2: 13; the second not specially designated, but for many reasons believed to have been so (John 5: 1); a third specified as a Passover (John 6: 4), and the fourth and final Passover when he was crucified. We know that Clement and others made the time one year, but as Irenæus said the early fathers differed among themselves, they had not the data for a conclusive judgment.

E. R., Holdrege, Neb. Could you please let me know where I could get a collection of familiar proverbs?

We believe all the familiar proverbs are included in "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts," which you can procure through our Book Department, price $2, expressage collect.

Mrs. T. H. M., Ozark, Ark. I see there is a movement on foot to take the words "In God We Trust" off of our coinage. I sincerely hope and pray that they will continue to have all our specie so stamped. I see that President Roosevelt is against the motto. I think it would be the greatest mistake we as a nation could make.

The motto "In God We Trust" has already been taken off the coins, but we believe a great majority of our citizens, in all the States, would be gratified to see the grand old watchword restored. We invite a free expression of opinion from all of our readers on this subject. Write your views on whichever side of the discussion you may happen to be. Write briefly, giving your reasons why the motto should be omitted or retained.

O. E. S., Abilene, Kan. Why not give or sell the Philippines to the Filipinos?

Secretary Taft's address in Manila lately showed clearly that our government had no present intention of selling the islands, but would stand by them and help educate them up to the standard of self-government.

Belle B., Mountville, Ga. What are the scientific facts, briefly stated, concerning the planet Mars?

Mars is the fourth known planet from the sun, its orbit being next outside the earth's. Its mean distance from the sun is 142,000,000 miles. Its orbit is quite elliptical, being at perihelion 26,000,000 miles nearer the sun than at aphelion. When Mars and the earth are on the same side of the sun at perihelion the distance between that planet and ours is only 35,000,000 miles. They are then called in opposition. This occurs about every fifteen years. Its last occurrence before this year was in 1892, and its next will be in the late summer of 1922. This opposition gives opportunity, through our giant telescopes, to study the red planet quite clearly. This year the planet has been photographed by many observers. The best negatives have been taken at the observatories of Prof. Lowell at Flagstaff, Ariz., and at Prof. Pickering's, in the Andes. The high altitudes avoid the dust, vapors and air currents. Good work has been done at the Lick Observatory, and in Russia Prof. Todd alone has taken 10,000 negatives, and many other observers scarcely fewer. These have confirmed to a large extent the observations made by Schiaparelli as early as 1877 of the canals on the surface of the planet. These canals are believed to be artificial and therefore affirm an intelligent organic life there. Mars has an atmosphere filled with aqueous vapors. Its polar caps prove this as well as the spectroscope. This atmosphere is less abundant and much rarer than ours. The planet has two moons of which little is known. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.
Seabreeze, Fla.

M. M. R., Colorado Springs, Col. Who were the ancestors of Joshua and to what tribe did he belong?

You will find Joshua's pedigree in I. Chron. 7: 20-27. He belonged to the tribe of Ephraim and was evidently a favorite with Moses and his trusted assistant and companion (see Ex. 17: 9; 24: 13; 33: 11) before he was appointed his successor.

Student Reader, Fayetteville, Ark. How many arsenals has the government and where are they situated?

According to the latest list to which we have access, there are fourteen: The Springfield Arsenal at Springfield, Mass.; the Allegheny, Pittsburg, Pa.; the Augusta, Augusta, Ga.; the Benicia, Benicia, Calif.; the Columbia, Columbia, Tenn.; the Frankford, Philadelphia, Pa.; the Indianapolis, Indianapolis, Ind.; the Kennebec, Augusta, Me.; the Monroe, Old Point Comfort, Va.; the New York, Governor's Island, New York Harbor; the Rock Island, Rock Island, Ill.; the San Antonio, San Antonio, Tex.; the Watervliet, Watervliet (formerly West Troy) N. Y., and the Watertown, Watertown, Mass., a few miles from Boston. The Rock Island is supposed to be the best equipped.

Loading a Shipment of Gold at Liverpool for the United States

THE month of November was an eventful one in gold importation for the relief of the money stringency here. Great Britain and other European countries sent us over $50,000,000, and arrangements are still pending for further large shipments, which may bring the total up to nearly $75,000,000. The gold is packed in iron-bound boxes, each containing $25,000 and weighing 112 pounds. These are guarded day and night by armed men during the passage across the Atlantic.

L. B., Gainesville, Fla. What is the Hebrew name for Jack?

"Jack" is English diminutive for "John," which in Hebrew is Johanan (or Yohanan).

R. S. T., Philadelphia, Pa. Kindly give derivation and meaning of the names of the different States of our Union.

Alabama, here we rest; Arkansas, bend of the smoky water; California, hot furnace; Colorado, red river; Connecticut, long river; Delaware, in honor of Lord Delaware; Florida, feast of flowers; Georgia, named for George II.; Illinois, tribe of men; Indiana, Indian land; Kansas, smoky water; Iowa, beautiful land; Kentucky, head of the river; Louisiana, named for Louis XIV.; Maine, named for French province; Maryland, named for Queen Henrietta Maria; Massachusetts, place of the great hills; Michigan, fishing place; Minnesota, sky-tinted water; Mississippi, father of waters; Missouri, muddy; Nebraska, water valley; Nevada, snow-covered; New Hampshire, from Hampshire, England; New Jersey, from Jersey island; New York, for Duke of York; the Carolinas, named for Charles, King of France; Ohio, beautiful river; Oregon, wild marjoram; Pennsylvania, Penn's woody land; Rhode Island, named for island in Mediterranean; Tennessee, river with the big bend; Vermont, green hills; Virginia, named for the virgin queen, Elizabeth; Wisconsin, gathering of the waters.

A. A. McL., Port Elgin, Canada. What is the meaning of Job 19: 26?

The meaning given in the Revised Version is undoubtedly correct. Job believed that even if his body was destroyed there would be new organs of vision provided and without his flesh he would see God.

W. P. R., Lake Odessa, Mich. 1. Where was the Garden of Eden located? 2. What nation was it that the writer predicted would be brought against the children of Israel for disobedience (Deut. 28: 49)? 3. Where is the land of Canaan located and do the same people or nations live there as before the children of Israel? 4. What became of the daughter of Jephtha? Was she sacrificed?

1. No one knows. Various writers place the site of Eden in Armenia, in Ceylon, in Arabia (the most probable site), and in other places. 2. It is supposed to refer to the invasion of the Romans. 3. Palestine, in Syria, now under Turkish rule. The descendants of the early tribes are supposed to have long since disappeared. 4. No one can tell. Some conjecture that she was immured in a convent or perpetual retreat; others that the vow of sacrifice was fulfilled literally.

J. W. B., Wisdom, Ky. 1. What is meant in Acts 13: 48, by being ordained to eternal life? 2. What lesson did Christ teach by his parable of the laborers, Matt. 20?

1. The passage has always been quoted by Calvinists as a proof text indicating election to eternal life. Arminian commentators contend that it means disposed, inclined, willing to accept. You may find a basis of agreement in the fact stated Phil. 2:13, that "God worketh in you to will and to do," which includes the disposing that the Arminians speak of. 2. The parable was an answer to Peter's question Matt. 19:27, which indicated a bargaining spirit. Christ taught that mere length of service did not confer on any man a right to demand reward. He would receive what he had been promised, but God was free to take other matters into consideration and to give a reward to laborers who had worked a shorter time, if he chose. Christ detested the bargaining spirit and the jealousy one of another (See Matt. 20:15), to which the apostles were prone.

Our Money-Saving Combinations

American Boy

A PROFUSELY illustrated monthly for boys, with nearly a quarter of a million readers. Without question the most entertaining and practical boys' magazine in the world. Clean and high grade. Covers in colors; big pages. Serials by Munroe, Stratemeyer, Alger, Harbour, Tomlinson, Trowbridge, Ellis, Shute, and other prominent writers. Boy hobbies, such as stamps, coins, photography, amateur journalism, puzzles, mechanics, electricity, biography, athletics exploited. Prize essays by boys—cartoons on boy subjects—also badges for excellence in school work and for heroism. It preaches the religion of "do" and not that of "don't." Approved by parents and educators. Enthusiastically supported by boys everywhere.

American Magazine

IS turned out by the most illustrious group of editorial workmen that has yet been assembled to make a magazine. Toiling together with heart and soul and mind, they write the best that can be written, and get from other pens the best that can be gotten—literature that lives and breathes and spurs to better living—illustrations that are true to life and nature.

They are John S. Phillips, editor-in-chief, formerly of McClure's Magazine; Ida M. Tarbell, F. P. Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Ray Stannard Baker, Lincoln Steffens and William Allen White.

Mr. Dooley will appear exclusively in every issue of The American Magazine in 1908—that's reason enough for adding it to your list.

Cosmopolitan

NO matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. They'll be subscribers next year—with their friends' friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1908 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by Oppenheim, or the remarkably popular "Wolfville Tales" of Alfred Henry Lewis. "The best—no matter what it costs," is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING is a richly illustrated magazine for all the family. It is, moreover, the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest, most refreshing periodicals for general reading. It tells not how things should be done, but in a breezy way how they have been done by clever people. It is woman's best resource in the daily perplexities of home management, and is the court of ultimate appeal for things domestic. In a word, it is a cheery, helpful companion for the entire household, for it is the meeting ground of hundreds of practical, inspiring writers. It is issued monthly and reaches no less than a million readers. Whatever magazines you take, Good Housekeeping should be one of them.

Harper's Bazar

FOR forty-one years Harper's Bazar has been the leading American authority on fashion, good form, and entertainment. It will continue to be an invaluable household guide and assistant.

Harper's Bazar is made for all refined American women. Such women are its most ardent admirers, whether their incomes are large or small, whether their scale of living is simple or complex, whether they dwell in towns or in the country.

Harper's Bazar preaches economy—rational domestic economy—and wise spending. Harper's Bazar preaches simplicity—the simplicity of sane, wholesome, rational living. Harper's Bazar preaches progress—progress in the kitchen, in the nursery, and in every other home department.

Ever Popular Christmas Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a Christmas gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through periodically reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A BEAUTIFULLY illustrated monthly magazine for young children. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and above all true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also play-work for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

THE Magazine in a vast country like the United States—where the dimensions are those of a continent—has an influence almost unlimited. It reaches as many thinking people on the west coast as on the east, in the South as in the North. The Paris press controls France; the London press controls England; but only the magazine is big enough to reach all America—such a field is beyond the scope of the greatest daily ever published.

McClure's Magazine was the first periodical to realize this great responsibility, and the first to make the monthly periodical a vital influence in good government and good citizenship—an instrument to help a great, wide-spread people understand itself and its possibilities.

Pearson's Magazine

DESTRUCTIVE journalism has had its day. Fair-minded conservatism is now having its inning. For almost two years Pearson's has been consistently constructive in its editorial policies. Now there have come to be imitators; but Pearson's remains—the leader.

In fiction, too, Pearson's has its distinctive quality. It is famous everywhere as the creator of Captain Kettle, Monsieur A. V., Don Q., Randolph Mason and Captain Romaine.

A novelty feature for the coming year is a light sociological study in verse, entitled "The Seven Stages of Unrest," by Carolyn Wells, exquisitely illustrated by Wallace Morgan—the creators of the famous "Fluffy Ruffles."

Review of Reviews

IN the coming Presidential election year, with its tense interest in the trusts, the tariff, the railroads, politics generally and political personages, the Review of Reviews will be doubly valuable to you. With Dr. Albert Shaw's monthly "Progress of the World"; with the cartoon history of the month; with the timely contributed articles on just the questions you are interested in; with the gist of the really important articles of all the other magazines of the world served up to you, and the reviews of new books—you can keep intelligently up with the times at a minimum cost of time, effort and money.

In the Review of Reviews you not only get the best informed, most timely and useful magazine in the world, but you also get over and above all the other periodicals, or just the part you need.

Success Magazine

THE investigation by Success Magazine of the opium curse in India, China and Japan, and of the responsibility of Great Britain and British traders for its extension against pitiful protests of the Chinese Government, who foresaw the inevitable demoralization of all classes of their people—forms the strongest, most important and most far-reaching work done by any American magazine for many years. Success has spent nearly $10,000 in making this investigation, sending Samuel Merwin—its special representative—for a six months' residence in the Orient for this purpose; and the first of this series of articles appears in Success for October, 1907. Also the beginning of "Lentala"—a new serial story of adventure—and the first of several articles on "The Real Thomas W. Lawson."

Woman's Home Companion

THE Woman's Home Companion gives to its readers each month as much good fiction as the story magazines, as much first-class art work as the picture magazines, more authoritative articles of interest to women than any other publication, and in addition a complete magazine of helpful departments, serving every practical need of the American woman.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale retains his position at the head of the Companion's editorial staff. Mrs. Sangster, Jack London, Madame Nordica, Paderewski, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, whose greatest novel is just beginning in the magazine, and the author of Eben Holden, are a few of the distinguished contributors to the 1908 Companion.

World To-Day (The)

THE only magazine of its class sold at a popular price. The World To-Day is a monthly world review, but is not made up of clippings of other publications. It obtains its information from original sources, and is reliable and up-to-date. Its contributors are the foremost men and women of the day. The reader will find in it recreation for the idle hour, and best of all—something worth while. Many illustrations are in colors. All other magazines of its class sell at $3. The World To-Day is but $1.50. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

ISAIAH 61 — The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me [b] to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn;

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzi-bah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 ¶ I [d] have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: [5] ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no [6] rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem [e] a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, [7] Surely I will no more give [f] thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

The Acts of the Apostles

Chapter 1

THE former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach,

2 Until the day in which he was taken up, after that he through the Holy Ghost had given commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen:

3 To whom also he showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God:

4 And, being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me.

5 For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence.

6 When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?

7 And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.

8 But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

9 And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight.

10 And while they looked stedfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel;

11 Which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath day's journey.

13 And when they were come in, they went up into an upper room, where abode both Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, Philip, and Thomas, Bartholomew, and Matthew, James the son of Alpheus, and Simon Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James.

14 These all continued with miracle that Jesus did, when he was come out of Judea into Galilee.

Chapter 5

AFTER this there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.

2 ¶ Now there is at Jerusalem by the sheep market a pool, which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda, having five porches.

3 In these lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.

4 For an angel went down at a certain season into the pool, and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had.

5 And a certain man was there, which had an infirmity thirty and eight years.

6 When Jesus saw him lie, and knew that he had been now a long time in that case, he saith unto him, Wilt thou be made whole?

7 The impotent man answered him, Sir, I have no man, when the water is troubled, to put me into the pool: but while I am coming, another steppeth down before me.

8 Jesus saith unto him, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk.

9 And immediately the man was made whole, and took up his bed, and walked: and on the same day was the sabbath.

10 ¶ The Jews therefore said unto him that was cured, It is the sabbath day: it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed.

11 He answered them, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk.

12 Then asked they him, What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk?

13 And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place.

14 Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.

15 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus, which had made him whole.

16 And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath day.

17 ¶ But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God.

Margaret E. Sangster Says: "A Benediction Every Day in the Year"

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD CALENDAR for 1908 is a dream of artistic perfection. Anything more bewitchingly dainty, more charmingly childlike, more radiantly beautiful than "Little Sunshine in Church" it has not been my good fortune to see.

The exquisite small maiden, a mother's darling, is sitting by herself in a high-backed pew, which forms a rich background for her delicately poised head and graceful little figure. She is dressed as a child of her rosebud type should be, in a garb of softly shimmering pink; her gray beaver hat is tied under her dimpled chin by gauzy ribbons of blossom tint, and her pretty hands are folded inside a great fluffy muff of sober brown. The Calendar is a study in color, with tones that melt and shade one into another in absolute harmony.

But the essential loveliness of the picture is in the sweet and thoughtful face of the child, for whom the setting is an appropriate frame.

Whoever is so happy as to receive this unsurpassed gem of art as an addition to the treasures that adorn the home, will be sure of a benediction every day in the year.

It Appeals to All Ages

"All the world loves a lover," and all the world idolizes a Hero. Stories of Heroes never grow old, and the older we grow the more we delight in them. These stories of World-famed Heroism will never, never lose their hold on us. We read them at ten, we read them at twenty, we still read them at forty or sixty or eighty. Mighty Exploits, Dauntless Courage, Heroic Achievement and Glorious Victory make the same irresistible appeal to us all. The Heroes whose Lives and Deeds are sketched in this Great Book begin with the Greek Perseus and Hercules, and end with Lee and Lincoln and Washington.

Like a Rejuvenating Tonic

The second half of the book comprises the Fairy Tales that may be called the Imperishable Stories of the World. Children love them as they love fresh air and sunshine, and when they grow up they learn their deeper meaning and real value. To the child, the Fairy Tale is no mere luxury, but a bread-and-butter necessity, and to us who hate to grow old—but too often forget to be young—a rejuvenating tonic.

Stories That Live Forever

Heroes and Fairies—Tales that Everybody Should Know—are stories for all the family. Here are stories that will delight the awakening mind of the child; stories that make boys and girls ambitious; stories that inspire us when the enthusiasm of life begins to drag. Underneath all of these beautiful old tales, whether myth or fairy phantasy, there is found a great moral principle which makes for character, and gives to the reader noble and beautiful ideals.

How the Model was Secured for Our 1908 Calendar

THE Forbes Lithograph Company, of Boston, who are reproducing for us in Fifteen Colors the Charming Water Color Painting entitled "Little Sunshine in Church," which is to be used in connection with Our Superb 1908 Calendar, send us the following explanation of how the model was secured:

"Your Calendar shows one of the sweetest, loveliest of girls, caught while in church waiting for the sermon to begin—a dainty little miss who looks calmly out on life's pathway from the safe harbor of a perfect home—and is a picture that expresses the Innocence and Purity of Childhood better than any recently published.

"In painting the original of this reproduction, the selection of the model was the first and most difficult task of the artist, and at last an advertisement for a beautiful little girl to pose was inserted in several daily newspapers, which led to fully fifty charming children being interviewed; none, however, seemed quite to express the artist's inspiration until little Shirley came into the studio just as the picture shows her, and the painting of 'Little Sunshine in Church' became a labor of love."

In hanging this beautiful work of art in your home you may be sure that it is a painting of a real little girl, and that the artist has caught the character of Purity and Childish Innocence that is hers by right, and that Every Sunday Morning this same little miss brings her share of "sunshine" into "church."

About Our New Calendar for 1908

THE Calendar for 1908 which we offer our readers is the finest possible example of fifteen-color lithographic reproduction of a charming water-color painting entitled "Little Sunshine in Church." No other work of art completed in recent years surpasses this Calendar either in the pure and wholesome quality of the subject or the really exceptional work of reproduction.

The painting is the work of an artist who has made the study of beautiful children a life work, and was drawn from a real little girl, so sweet that the painter had but to catch her likeness to create a lovely picture full of that tender sentiment that pervades every perfect home. It is executed in water-color, a medium especially adapted for such a subject because of its rich, tender and delicate shades and tints.

The reproduction is in fifteen separate colors or printings, which will be better understood when we assure our readers that many of the Calendars and colored prints of the day are produced in only three or four. The Calendar is printed on special art paper, and is a most deserving addition to any home. It is just such a picture as our readers will welcome, and goes FREE with Every Annual Subscription to The Christian Herald. Address

A Real India-Paper Red Letter Bible

What is a Red Letter Bible?

A Red Letter Bible differs from an ordinary Bible in many important points. While the text is the same in both Bibles, the ordinary Bible is printed in black throughout, but the Red Letter Bible employs two colors, viz., Red and Black. Although the black color largely predominates, the red color is used to excellent advantage, thus:

FIRST—In the Old Testament all passages quoted by our Lord, or referred to by him, are printed in red.

SECOND—In the New Testament all the words universally accepted as spoken by our Saviour are printed in red.

THIRD—Every verse in the Old Testament which embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah is distinguished by a red star.

The style of type used in this Bible is the same throughout, whether the passage is printed in black or in red.

The Words of Our Lord

It is interesting just here to recall the divergence of opinion among a group of notable clergymen, who were in conference in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices when the question was put to them: "What percentage of the Gospels do you think was actually spoken by Christ himself?" One answered about ten per cent., another said fifteen per cent., while a third ventured to estimate them at twenty-five per cent. An investigation revealed that all the clergymen were wrong and that the actual number spoken by our Lord equaled nearly one-half of all the words contained in the Gospels.

The Red Letter Bible gives the exact proportion, and according to it Christ uttered of the Gospels as follows:

Of Matthew,	54	per cent.
Of Mark,	36	"

or an average of 47½ per cent. of them all.

Thus, nearly half of the words contained in the Gospels were spoken by our Lord. The relative length of the Gospels is as follows: Matthew, 5,050 lines; Mark, 3,206 lines; Luke, 5,350 lines; John, 3,952 lines.

His References to the Old Testament

How many quotations from the Old Testament and how many references to incidents mentioned in the Old Testament were made by Christ during his earthly ministry?

The Red Lettering through the Old Testament promptly and correctly reveals them to us. Among others, we find the ever-memorable words our Saviour used on the cross, when he said, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" to be the opening words of the 22d Psalm, and of course this quotation is printed in red in the Old Testament. Then the words, "Into thy hand I commend my spirit," are the opening words of the 5th verse of the 31st Psalm, and are also printed in red; and the new commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," may be found printed in red in Leviticus 19: 18.

Then the story of the Fiery Serpents, the ceremonies to be observed by lepers, the story of Lot, the words which Christ read from the Old Testament when he sat in the Synagogue at Nazareth, the story of Jonah, and hundreds of other interesting passages and quotations are all quickly brought to the attention of the reader, the teacher, the superintendent, the student, or the pastor by appearing conspicuously in Red Lettering among the black text of the Bible.

Thus we have emphasized in red in this beautiful Bible all the words recorded as having been actually uttered by Christ, all the references he made to the Old Testament and all the quotations which he used in his discourses during his earthly ministry. In addition to all this, every reference to Christ as the coming Messiah is clearly marked with a red star.

Small Bibles in Great Demand

Heretofore, large Bibles were preferred on account of their low cost, but now the demand is for small Bibles printed from clear and easily legible type on thin paper of light weight. This demand is met in our new Red Letter Bible, which, though weighing only one pound and four ounces, is as legible as our former Red Letter Bible, weighing nearly three times as much, the contents being absolutely the same. Bold-face type of our special design and India paper enabled us to achieve this great triumph in Bible-making.

A Statement from Dr. Louis Klopsch, Editor of "The Christian Herald"

TWO years ago I set my heart upon making a better Red Letter Bible for "The Christian Herald" subscribers than could then be found on the market. I determined that the Bible should be small; that the type should be large; that the paper should be thin and of light weight; that there should be References, Helps and Maps, and that the Binding should be as good as the best and Leather Lined. The result of our efforts is stated below, and I feel sure that every prospective purchaser will be delighted with the new Bible.

This Middle Column is in the Same Type that is Used in Our New Bible

We looked over all the different faces of type and found none that suited our ideas as to legibility, so we had a type specially designed, and had steel dies cut from which to cast it. There were 125 different characters cut and cast, and when the work was done we considered that it was not as good as it might have been. Then we ordered another set of steel dies from another type foundry, and when that type was cast we discovered that some of the characters were weak, and these we supplanted by other and better ones. Finally we finished the whole 125 characters—every one practically perfect. A better type for the purpose was never devised. ☞You are reading it at this moment.

The Paper of Our New Bible

We made a thorough search in American and English paper markets, but they had nothing to offer as good as we required it. Finally a firm of American paper brokers undertook to have manufactured for us in Italy a paper that promised to prove altogether satisfactory, and when it arrived six months after the order was given, we found that it measured up to all that had been claimed for it. It is India paper, made in Italy, almost as thin as onion skin, and yet so thoroughly opaque that, when seen in the Bible, one can scarcely believe that it is printed on both sides, for not a letter in the entire book shows through. Then the paper is so light that the entire Bible with Helps and Maps weighs only ONE POUND and four ounces.

As to the Binding

For a book so valuable, so important, and so exquisite, the binding must needs be in keeping with the contents; hence, in settling on the material to be used for the binding, we determined that it must be rich, durable, flexible and attractive. After examining many varieties and many grades, we decided to use real Morocco, the same as is used only on the costliest Bibles. The Standard Dictionary defines real Morocco as "A leather made from goat skin; named after the city of Morocco. It was originally a product of the Levant, Turkey and Mediterranean Africa, and is distinguished for pliancy, fineness and toughness of texture, which fit it particularly for bookbinding." This correctly describes the leather which we selected, and in which the entire edition has been bound.

Of course this Leather Lined Bible is bound in Divinity Circuit. That is, it has round corners, red under gold, and overlapping edges. There is not a more attractive Bible on the market. It is made of the best materials throughout, and five years ago $15 would have been considered the right price.

Size and Contents of Our New Bible

The Version used in this Bible is that known as the King James or Authorized Version. The Spelling is modern. The References are in the centre of the page. The Text of the Bible is set in this bold-face minion, and covers 1,203 pages. Then there are 268 pages of Helps and 17 superb Maps. The volume measures 7¾ inches in length, 5½ inches in width and 1 inch in thickness, and weighs only 20 ounces. The result is a gem of a Bible, small in size, light in weight, very legible, very durable and beautiful to look upon—the greatest achievement in modern Bible-making.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, Editor of "The Christian Herald," is the Originator of the Red Letter Principle applied to the Holy Scriptures. No other so-called Red Letter Bible applies the Red Letter Principle to the OLD Testament.

As it took six months to secure the paper and six months to print this edition, it will be out of the question to get additional copies until the Fall of 1908; hence we are determined to reserve this entire edition for "Christian Herald" subscribers exclusively. Therefore if you want to secure a copy of this First Edition, you must subscribe for "The Christian Herald," or if already a subscriber, you must send your renewal.

The Price of Our New Bible

One would suppose that a Bible manufactured on such generous lines must necessarily be an expensive one. India Paper Bibles bound in real Morocco and Leather Lined are seldom listed at less than $10; even then they are not Red Letter Bibles, which feature adds materially to the cost. But we know that very few people can afford to pay that much money for a Bible, and as we are anxious to ultimately secure for this superb book a circulation of at least a million copies, we have decided to offer this first Edition at an Introductory Bargain Price. Here it is: Any subscriber to "The Christian Herald" who acts before these ten thousand Bibles are sold may, by sending FOUR DOLLARS, have his subscription to "The Christian Herald" RENEWED for one year, and receive, all charges prepaid, one of these Superb New Red Letter Bibles. If you want it act quickly or you will be too late. Money refunded if not fully pleased. Address:

CONSECRATED FROM BOYHOOD

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

HANNAH, the wife of Elkanah, was sorely grieved because she had no child. And when she went with her husband to make their yearly visit to offer sacrifices to God in Shiloh, where was the tent of meeting, the Tabernacle, she went and stood alone at the door, that she might pray to God for a child. She prayed: "If thou, Lord, wilt give thy servant a man-child, then I will give him unto Jehovah all the days of his life." She wept as she prayed. Old Eli, the high priest, saw her, and at first took her to be drunk; but when he found that he was mistaken, he gave her his blessing, and said, "Go in peace, and the God of Israel grant thy petition." Then she returned to her home, and in less than a year a baby boy was born unto her, whom she named Samuel, which means, "heard of God."

Samuel was a child of prayer. When parenthood is looked upon as a sacred share of God's Creatorship, what riches of character will come to children by heredity as well as training! Every child should be dedicated to God, not alone those that it is hoped will minister from the pulpit, for all should minister to God and man even from childhood, whether they play or plough or preach, doing "all to the glory of God." Even play may be so done in the thought that play is preparation for work, and that in it we may show our Christian principles. How can any mother fail to encircle her child with her against the many perils he must encounter? How can any father fail to be good if only for his child's sake? "There are natures in which if they love us we are conscious of having a sort of baptism or consecration. They bind us over to rectitude and purity by their pure belief about us; and our sins become the worst kind of sacrilege, which tears down the invisible altar of trust. 'If you are not good none is good'—those little words may give a terrific meaning to responsibility, may hold a vitriolic intensity for remorse."

Prayers as a Body-guard

Hannah did not go up to Shiloh again to offer sacrifices until little Samuel was weaned, at three years of age. Then she went up with Elkanah, her husband, taking little Samuel with her that he might, as she said, "abide there forever," for she had "given him unto Jehovah all the days of his life." And so Samuel was a consecrated child. Appropriate offerings were made in his behalf by his parents as being wholly consecrated to the Lord. And then the mother sang a hymn of her own which is worthy of being classed with the Magnificat of Mary, the mother of Jesus.

In contrast to such mothers as Samuel's, we recall that professedly Christian mother to whose room her boy of seventeen came one night and said, "Mother, I have been going to the special meetings at Central Church, and have about decided to be a Christian. If you will go with me to-night I think I can decide it." She replied, "I cannot go to-night; I have an engagement." The mother in telling the story later said in keen remorse, "To my shame he found that the engagement was for a euchre party. I kept my engagement, but I lost my boy. He has not been in church for a year. No word of mine can affect him, and I am heart-broken." In these days the children of Christian homes should become members of the church in very early years. The writer has received one boy at five, who understood the step he had taken on his own motion better than many older members.

The Tabernacle Helper

Hannah and Elkanah returned to their home, leaving their little Samuel with Eli the high priest, in order that he might be schooled in all that pertained to a prophet and priest of God, and so Samuel was a well-trained child. Ever afterwards the parents saw him only year by year as they came to Shiloh to offer their yearly sacrifices. Each time the mother brought him a little coat of her own making to wear under his priestly garment.

Eli began Samuel's training by setting him such tasks as a little boy might do, such as opening and shutting the door of the Tabernacle, and taking care of the lamps, and doing errands. So Samuel was a helpful child.

Whenever Eli would call to Samuel, he would run at his bidding, even in the night time. Eli was old and feeble, and needed the service of the boy. Samuel was an obedient child. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, the lecturer, used to tell how her life was saved by instantly obeying a voice. She was on a railroad train. A voice in her ear, perhaps that of a brakeman or conductor who saw an approaching collision, said, "Jump quick to the other side." Not knowing then or ever who spoke, she instantly obeyed, and had barely done so when the side of the car she had left was broken in and demolished. What soul wrecks, what regrets over lost opportunities we would escape by similar unquestioning, instant obedience to God!

The Call in the Night

One night Samuel arose from his bed three times, having been awakened out of his sleep by hearing his name called: "Samuel! Samuel!" He thought it was Eli who had called him. Each time he said, as he reached Eli's bedside: "Here am I, for thou calledst me." Twice Eli replied: "I called not, lie down again," but when Samuel came the third time, Eli said to the boy: "It is Jehovah who has called thee; go, and lie down again, and if he speaks again, answer, 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.'" And Samuel laid down in his place, and listened. He had not long to wait before he heard his name called: "Samuel! Samuel!" and he knew that it was God's call, and he answered: "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

"And Samuel arose and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me"

After Samuel had listened to the voice, when the morning came, although he knew that the Lord had God had many things to say to him. Samuel was a God-fearing child.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of London, has this to say of his own early conversion:

"You will say, 'Where was your conversion?' I do not know. I have never been able to date it. I cannot tell you where it was. I am perfectly sure that, at some time in those years, to what my parents told me of my relation to God I said 'Amen'; that at some moment my heart and will responded without knowing it to the claim set up upon me by my loved ones, and I know at that moment the will of the child said 'Yes' to the will of the King, and the King took the child into his kingdom and the child was born again. But I say this to you also, Be very, very careful that you are converted. I do not know that I am born again by any experience of thirty years ago, but by the present throbbing of God in my life and soul, his Spirit bearing witness with my spirit here and now."

A child invited to come to Jesus at one of Josiah Spiers' meetings for children, looked up and said, "I know what Jesus will say if I come to him." "What will he say?" said Mr. Spiers. "He will say, 'Come along, little one, I am so glad to see you.'" A boy was walking home from school with a playmate of about the same age, to whom he said, "Charlie, do you know Jesus?" The other said, "I have heard and read a great deal about him." "Oh, I don't mean that. I know him to talk to."

If I come to Jesus, happy shall I be; chosen him to be henceforth a prophet, he went about his common work of opening the doors as before. And so Samuel was a faithful child.
He is gently calling little ones like me.

What can children do for God to-day? We can't live in the church always. That is almost what Luther asked, when he became a man and found an old parchment Bible in the monastery where he was a monk, and read the story of Samuel. He said, "What can I do? Samuel exposed the corrupt priest: so will I." We cannot all be Samuels or Luthers, but we can each do something. We have heart-lamps to keep trimmed and shining with loving prayers and kind deeds, until Jesus comes. And there are Gospel lights in heathen lands to be kept burning by our prayers and gifts. Besides, each of us can be God's still small voice to lead men to Jesus. By such lives, like Samuel, we shall "grow and be in favor with the Lord and also with men."

A little girl went home from church one Sunday full of what she had seen and heard. A day or two afterward, when talking with her father, who was not a godly man, she said suddenly: "Father, do you ever pray?" He did not like the question, and in a very angry manner asked her: "Is it your mother or your aunt who has put you up to this?" "No, father," said the little child; "the preacher said and those who do not pray can not be saved. Father, do you pray?" This was more than the father could stand, and in a rough way he said: "Well, you and your mother and your aunt may go your way and I will go mine." "Father," said the little creature with great simplicity, "which way are you going?" The question pierced his heart. It flashed upon him that he was in the way to death, and he began to pray for mercy.

When Eli arose from his bed in the morning, and came into the Tabernacle, he asked Samuel if the Lord had spoken to him, and what the Lord had said. Samuel hesitated to tell Eli, because God had spoken to Samuel concerning the unfaithfulness of Eli in not restraining his sons from evil. And God had told Samuel that both of Eli's sons should die in one day, as a punishment for their sins, and that Eli should have no son to be priest in his stead when he should die. It was hard for Samuel, child that he was, to tell these things to Eli, now nearly one hundred years old. But Samuel did tell him, because it was the Lord who had given him the message, and so Samuel was a brave child.

On the birthday of the Chinese Emperor, August 15, in a recent year, all the boys' schools within five miles of Haicheng were invited to come and prove their loyalty by kneeling and kowtowing—knocking the face on the ground—before a tablet of the Emperor. Now this kowtowing is regarded as worship, and a certain Anglo-Chinese missionary school was not only invited to join in the proceedings, but to lead. But the Christian teachers and scholars were of the spirit of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, and resolved they would not worship whatever might be the consequences. They offered instead to show their patriotism by saluting the Emperor in military style and singing "God Save the Emperor." This they were allowed to do.

As to Eli, the unfaithful father, his character was a peculiar mixture. He had some good qualities, mostly negative. For example, freedom from envy of Samuel, whom God favored and who was to supersede him, and resignation to God's will when it was revealed. But on the other hand, there was a sinful neglect of God's repeated warnings, and a cowardly shrinking from the duty of parental restraint and discipline. "A shy, solitary, amiable ecclesiastic and recluse—that was Eli." See him as a father, despised and disobeyed by his own sons. See him a little later, condemned of God for his neglect. See him last of all, disgraced because his sons have stolen away the ark of God, that none but the high priest was even to see in the Tabernacle. His error was chiefly that indulgence crowded out restraint and discipline in his home.

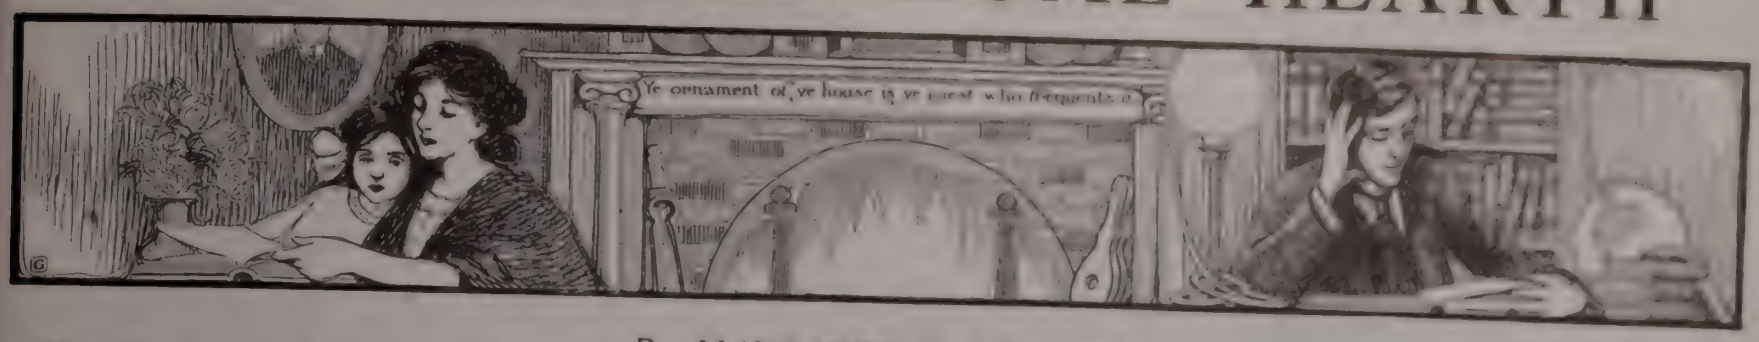
AROUND THE HOME HEARTH



The Saving of Street Boys

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WHEN supper is over and the lamps are lighted, when the children around the table are busy over their schoolwork for the next day, appealing now and then to their father or mother for a little help in a puzzling example, do you ever give a thought to the thousands and ten-thousands of boys in great cities who know nothing of this sweet home life? To them home means a shifting place of shelter, a bit of space in a crowded tenement house, a haunt in a cellar, a life in which there are blows and bruises, and nothing of peace and security. The destruction of the poor is their poverty. It is also their dense ignorance. The fathers earn little, many of them being day laborers, with wives untutored in cooking and other domestic arts, and the children come up as best they can. From babyhood a host of boys learn to take care of themselves on the sidewalk. The law compels attendance at school up to a certain age. Out of school the boys learn what they can, and often the law is evaded and boys are thrust too soon into the bitterness of hard work. Jane Addams, who is an authority, tells us that the streets are the natural refuge of boys who have no real home, and that the early forcing these boys into work stunts their growth, saps their strength, and is at the basis of a later revolt that accounts for tramp life and vagrancy, if not for direct criminality.

Unless society looks out for these boys, lifts them up, gives them a chance and leads them into manhood by some safe path, they cannot but become by and by a peril to the republic. They may become a great source of profit, and from them reinforcements may be drawn for the ranks of good citizens. But in order to do this somebody who loves and understands boys must get hold of them at just the right minute. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has long lent a hand in this direction in the beautiful and blessed work it carries on every summer at Mont-Lawn. Many a little lad has here received his first impulse toward clean, wholesome life and pure aims.

An interesting and suggestive book bearing the title, Waifs of the Slums, and Their Way Out, written by Leonard Benedict, tells the story of a sustained and successful effort, now going forward in Chicago, for the saving of street boys. In that city, as in New York, St. Louis and other crowded towns, a multitude of active little fellows begin their future career by selling newspapers. Only a small percentage of the newsboys in the big cities are of American birth. They are Italians, Hebrews, Russians, Poles; are either themselves foreign-born or have parents to whom English is still a foreign tongue. The best substitute that has yet been found for home life in the case of such boys as these is the boy's club. It provides a warm and comfortable room with tables and chairs and plenty of light, and the boys come to it and are made to feel that it belongs to them. To be complete, the boys' club should have as part of its outfit a gymnasium, but given the warm room with which to start they may wait for this until funds enough are raised for its equipment. Usually a young man, oftener than not a university graduate, is found ready to devote himself to leadership in a boys' club, and there are not lacking a number of college men who are willing to consecrate some of their evenings to the teaching and training of these boys. Such teaching and training as there is is very much on the big brother order.

The chief necessity is to make friends of the boys and prepare them for better positions than they obtain if left to drift about unaided and tempted in streets where saloons flaunt their lures at every corner. People who are on the outside of such work as this little know how much the parents who have missed nearly everything pleasant in life long for the good that may come to their children. The mother, pale and anæmic at her sewing machine, the stooping-shouldered cobbler bending over his last, the man from whom the sweat shop has drained every lingering drop of vitality, and the woman at her wash-tub with babies clinging to her skirts, all keep in their hearts pride in and love for their offspring. Often they have a passionate though dumb yearning that the sons may do better than the fathers. If the friendly visitor goes to such homes as they have, not in condescension and patronage, but with real fraternal cordiality, he will not be turned away.

In the boys' club and in the various ramifications leading from it we find the most successful agency existent at present for the saving of street boys. When they are sent to reformatories it is often too late to hope for any lasting benefit. Not the iron hand of repression, but the sympathetic heart-beat of unselfish love is needed if the boys are to become good men and true in the future.

A BOY'S FANCY

If I were a man, and my rooster a horse,
We'd gallop and fly to the moon, of course.

About That Baby

The old-fashioned way of bringing up that baby was to let everybody handle it, kiss it and cuddle it, to walk the floor when it cried, to rock the cradle back and forth and to give it food as often as it was willing to accept it. The new-fashioned way is to let baby sleep as much as possible, nurse it or feed it at certain hours, carefully timed, let it sleep in a crib and discourage its relatives from walking, jumping, caressing and handling it; treating it, in short, as a little organism that must needs have room to grow naturally, and that has at first only animal wants. Baby used to be guarded against fresh air; now hundreds of babies, especially those born with a golden spoon, live in the fresh air from morning until night. Summer sun and winter snow are alike good backgrounds for the modern baby who is scientifically brought up. As for giving a tiny child who is teething or toddling about at a later age a taste of this and the other food from the family table, such folly is no longer tolerated.

The Care of Health

IN the case of health as much as of prevention is worth a pound of cure. In these days, when [illegible] or [illegible], we know [illegible] them our forefathers did about disease germs, between and all sorts of [illegible] that for good or ill are [illegible] us. It is right and proper that every precaution should be taken and every means of [illegible] but there is no excuse for wanton cruelty or [illegible] cowardice.

The laws that regulate ordinary health are few and simple. Pure air, plenty of sleep, sufficient exercise, strict cleanliness and plain food are the only and indeed the absolute essentials to being well. Dirt is a sworn foe to good health. People who neglect a daily bath and allow the pores of the skin to become clogged need not expect to be well or to retain beauty. A man or woman who prizes good health will either at morning or evening take a bath. A tub is not necessary, a basin of water, a sponge and a rough towel meet every requirement. Those who habitually retire after midnight burn life's candle at both ends, particularly if their duties oblige them to be early risers. Without abundance of sleep the waste places of nature cannot be repaired. Indigestion and dyspepsia are the attendant fiends that follow in the wake of hurry, worry and scanty sleep. Rich food hastily eaten, stimulants and narcotics are inimical to health. They who lead a sluggish existence without daily exercise are sure to be the prey of some lurking malady or other. Constipation digs many a grave. Unless the drainage of the body be perfect and thorough insidious poisons undermine vitality.

Parents cannot too solicitously watch children with regard to this latter feature of health. The child must [illegible] to school in the morning, or the lad a little older rushed to business without attending to the relief of the body by the daily evacuation of the bowels, and the [illegible] nature's rejected residue. Armenia's "Fighting Parson"

RECENT telegraphic news from the Caucasus has told of the redoubled activities of the police and gendarmes in that turbulent section of the Russian Empire. A telegram from Elizabethpol announces that the Armenian district of that city was searched, and stores of hidden arms and ammunition were discovered, and the Armenian archimandrite, Monsignor Coryun, was arrested with several other ecclesiastics.

Monsignor Coryun

This high prelate is a typical "fighting parson" of the Orient. When Turks and Tartars attacked their peaceful Armenian neighbors, the latter were taken unawares, and a general stampede followed. Whole villages and townships were burned, sacked and pillaged, and the defenseless Christian inhabitants were tortured, looted and massacred. The population appealed to the Czar for protection, but the Russian chinovniks persisted in ordering the police and Cossacks to look on placidly and allow the carnage and destruction to go on unchecked.

During these desperate struggles many a priest and archimandrite of the Armenian Church proved himself a hero and a patriot. Amongst them was Monsignor Coryun. Wearing the furry cap and cloak of a Cossack, as well as the long dagger and curving sword, his chest covered with rows of cartridge belts and the jeweled cross of his clerical rank suspended from the collar, he was always in the thickest of the fight. Sometimes hamlets and villages were left in charge of the young Armenian women, who, when their homes were attacked, would arm themselves with guns and, under the leadership of their parish priests, make a heroic defense. Archimandrite Coryun, it is said, has always been a stanch and loyal subject of the Czar, and could not be implicated in any political plot against his sovereign.

Celebrating Their Redemption

IT is now thirty-five years since Jerry McAuley started the little mission which afterwards became known all around the world as The McAuley Water Street Mission. During that time over a million people have passed through its doors, and over one hundred thousand have knelt at the penitent form.

This past year has been, without exception, the most fruitful year of the Mission's history. Men from all stations in life have been rescued from sin, and are living monuments to the power of God to save and keep. One young man was a drunkard for over twenty years, and had brought sorrow and remorse into the lives of his Christian mother and two sisters. They had about given up all hope of his ever changing his life, and felt he must eventually fill a drunkard's grave. In April last, he gave his heart to God, and never for one moment has he turned his eyes away from him who saved him. He has a fine tenor voice, and night after night can be heard in the Mission singing the praise of Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. Two other converts, brothers, came to the Mission. One knelt at the altar, but refused to pray until some one went out and brought in his twin brother. He came, and then the two brothers knelt side by side and sought from God the forgiveness of their sins.

For many years it has been the custom to have a convert of the Mission hold an anniversary in his spiritual birthplace, when he has stood faithful for a year. Frequently anniversaries of from one to twenty years or more are held. The convert who celebrates has entire charge of the meeting, and his friends come and rejoice with him. On a recent evening the hall was crowded with friends gathered here to congratulate Joseph Guest on one year of faithful service for Christ. On the platform was his faithful wife, their little girl of eleven years, and other relatives. Mr. Guest read the 34th Psalm. Then he related a portion of his life's story and his long slavery to drink, and finally how he had knelt in this hallowed place while Jesus spoke peace to his soul. He soon afterward secured a good position, and now the family has a comfortable home, and are a happy family on their way to heaven.

A few weeks later, a similar gathering took place here when Joseph's brother, George, celebrated his first spiritual anniversary. He, too, was enabled, after a severe struggle, to cast off the power of drunkenness which had separated him from a Christian wife for years.

These are examples among many of the same class to be found in the Old Water Street Mission, praising God for redemption.

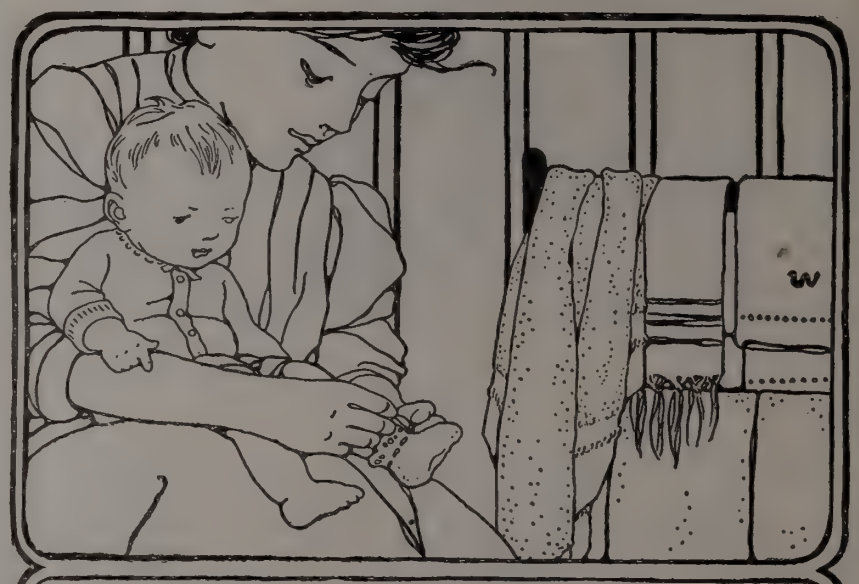
Missionary Work Among Sailors

THE work of the Mission Yacht Association among the seamen of the port of New York this year has been most satisfactory. Nearly seventy tons of literature have been placed on ships and sent over the seas. Some of this reading matter has found its way among the mounted police of Hudson Bay, while more has been carried up the Bay of Fundy and given to the woodsmen and settlements along the shore. Ships that carry it forth do not only give it to other ships, but to English-speaking people in Spanish-American countries, as well as in the Oriental lands.

The literature received by the sailors from the Mission yacht is carried to sea where it is carefully read on their long voyages, and when time hangs heavily on their hands. There they have few counteracting influences to destroy the good impression gained from the printed page, and there, too, many change their sinful course by anchoring on the promises of God.

In addition to other reading matter, the Association has 318 libraries on as many ships, and ten thousand volumes of books waiting to be sent out as soon as the funds needed for library cases can be raised. Twenty-five books make a library.

The Association invites financial aid in the work of the Mission yacht, which is wholly supported by voluntary offerings.



TO BATHE BABY PROPERLY

You need: A portable tin or porcelain bathtub, a washcloth or a piece of flannel, a sponge, a cake of Ivory Soap, a bath thermometer and a couple of very soft towels.

The water should be soft and of a temperature of 95° in winter and from 85° to 90° in summer.

Put baby in the bath. Moisten the washcloth and apply soap, first to the face and neck, then to the arms, next to the body, and last to the legs and feet. Fill the sponge with water from the tub and squeeze its contents over the face, arms, body and legs, repeating this until all dirt and soap are removed. Dry by "patting"—not rubbing—with the towels. The best hour for baby's bath is ten in the morning, or in the evening, just before he is given his last bottle.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

Ivory Soap - 99 44/100 Per Cent. Pure.

The Family Bible

An old favorite, republished by request

HOW painfully pleasing the fond recollection
Of youthful emotion and innocent joy,
When blessed with parental advice and affection,
Surrounded with mercies and peace from on high,
I still view the chair of my father and mother,
The seats of their offspring as ranged on each hand,
And that richest of books that excels every other,
The family Bible that lay on the stand—
The old-fashioned Bible, the dear blessed Bible,
The family Bible that lay on the stand.

That Bible—the volume of God's inspiration,
At morn and at evening could yield us delight.
The prayer of our sire was a sweet invocation
For mercy by day and for safety by night.
Our hymns of thanksgiving with harmony swelling,
All warm from the heart of a family band,
Half raised us from earth to that rapturous dwelling
Described in that Bible that lay on the stand.

Ye scenes of tranquillity—long have we parted,
My hopes almost gone and my parents no more.
In sorrow and sadness I live broken-hearted
And wander unknown on a far-distant shore.
Yet how can I doubt my dear Saviour's protection?
Forgetful of gifts from his bountiful hand?
Oh let me with patience receive his correction
And think of the Bible that lay on the stand—
The old-fashioned Bible, the dear blessed Bible,
The family Bible that lay on the stand.

Converted from Judaism

AN interesting conversion in the work of ex-Rabbi Leopold Cohn among the Jews in Greater New York is that of Mr. Orah Heend. His story, as told by himself, is as follows:

"One Friday evening, as I passed the mission at 626 Broadway, Brooklyn, I became curious to know what was going on within. So I entered and found Mr. Cohn discussing the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and telling the audience that if they would only study the prophets they would be convinced that Jesus is the Messiah. Although I was not a religious Jew, and only attended the synagogue on New Year's and Day of Atonement, yet I thought that Mr. Cohn was blaspheming when he said our Messiah had already come, and that by believing on him our sins would be forgiven. I attended another meeting the next week, and was impressed with the sincerity of the speaker. I made up my mind to study and find out for myself.

"Next day I bought a Bible and bound it with paper, so that others could not recognize it. I read in the cars going to and from work. When I had finished the New Testament, the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and the twelfth of Zechariah, I knew that I had found God's holy truth, but yet I said to myself, 'How can I, a born Jew, believe in Jesus? It is impossible.' I prayed to God that, if it was the truth, he would put love in my heart for Christ. I continued going to the mission, and at last realized, by the joy in my heart, that I did love the Master. I could not contain myself, and began to tell my friends, thinking that they, too, would see the truth. But, alas! they told me I was a lunatic, and laughed and jeered at me, and said I would soon get over my whim. Yet the more they laughed, the stronger my faith became.

"I have an aged mother, three sisters and three brothers, all of whom I dearly love. While visiting one of my sisters who lives in New York, I told her of the truth I had found, and how it had made a better man of me. They wrote to the rest of my family saying I had become a Christian. Soon letters began to arrive from all directions, begging me to change, threatening to cast me off, and telling what pain it was causing my mother. A couple of weeks passed, and I received more heartrending epistles and offers of money—in fact, anything, if I would only give up Christ. But I had found the truth and was going to stick to it.

"A few weeks later my sister asked me to go to the chief rabbi and he would prove to me I was wrong, and if he could not prove this they would become Christians. I accepted the proposition, and the following Sunday my brother-in-law, myself and Mr. Cohn went to the rabbi. The rabbi asked what made me believe. I answered, by studying the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and the twelfth chapter of Zechariah, and numerous other proofs in the Old Testament. He started in to refute by saying that Zechariah meant himself when he said, 'They will look upon me whom they have pierced.' But Mr. Cohn proved to him that this was impossible, as he was not killed, but Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, was stoned; and the rabbi had to agree. Then the rabbi went on to say that the Jewish religion is only to believe in God and to treat your fellowmen honestly, and that we are not to believe anything that man has written, except the Bible. My faith was much strengthened through this debate.

"When my wife heard I had been baptized, it nearly broke her heart, and she did not want to remain with me any longer. But she has now decided to stay, with the understanding that I am not to talk religion with her. I am in hopes that she also will become a believer in Christ in the near future."

Ex-Rabbi Cohn will be glad to answer any inquiries by readers of this paper regarding his mission work. He may be addressed at No. 620a Quincy Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

[We will gladly send the writer's address to any one who may be interested in this most deserving case and who has the means to help.]

Friend, South Carolina. "God has saved me from a great trial. I promised God I would tell the world about it if he delivered me. Glory to his name!"

Miss E. W., New York. "I enjoy reading the answers to prayer. It is the first thing I read on receiving the paper. There is always something to encourage me in each number."

W. R. G., California. "I have perfect faith in prayer. First, because I believe the Bible; second, from the experience of a lifetime. Recently I asked God to avert a serious financial trouble, and he graciously answered me, unworthy though I be. Hallelujah!"

Father's Child, Canada. "I had what threatened to be a serious trouble. For a time I saw serious trouble ahead. I was perplexed as to what to do. I went with it to God and oh, how graciously he answered, and all cleared away in a very little time. I have had many direct answers to prayer. I bring every trouble to God and he always helps me."

J. W. T., Canada. "A friend was in financial difficulty. She told us of it. We joined with her in prayer for help. She was seeking to do her very best. God answered. From a source that could not have been thought of, all needed help came, unsought and unasked for. I know God hears prayer and answers."

New Stories of Lincoln*

THERE were many angles in Lincoln's character. That which he showed in the telegraph office was the personal, homely side as distinguished from the business, political, or literary side. The cipher-operators saw him at close range, and in his most anxious hours, amid the excitement of great military movements, with their attendant horrors: the clash of arms, the carnage of the battle-field, the groans of the dying and the tears of loved ones. We also met him in the calmer but no less trying hours of patient waiting for the slow development of wide-reaching plans for the preservation of the Union.

Reference being made by some one in the telegraph office to Lincoln's inveterate habit of story-telling, he said that he really could not break himself of it; that it had been formed in his younger days, and later he found it difficult to refrain from clinching an argument or emphasizing a good point by means of a story. He said his case was like that of the old colored man on the plantation, who neglected his work in order to preach to the other slaves, who often idled their time away listening to the old man's discourses. His master admonished him, but all to no purpose, for the good old man had the spirit of the Gospel in him and kept on preaching, even when he knew the lash awaited him; but finally he was ordered to report at the "big house," and was berated soundly by his master and told that he would be punished severely the very next time he was caught in the act of preaching. The old man, with tears in his eyes, spoke up and said, "But, marsa, I jest cain't help it; I allus has to draw infrunces from de Bible textes when dey comes into my haid. Doesn't you, marsa?" This reply interested his master, who was a religious man, and who said, "Well, uncle, I suspect I do something of that kind myself at times, but there is one text I never could understand, and if you can draw the right inference from it, I will cancel my order and let you preach to your heart's content." "What is de tex', marsa?" "'The ass snuffeth up the east wind.' Now, uncle, what inference do you draw from such a text?" "Well, marsa, I's neber heered dat tex' befo', but I 'spect de infrunce is she gotter snuff a long time befo' she git fat."

One catch phrase which Lincoln especially enjoyed repeating was, "Oil's well that ends well." He was particularly fond of David R. Locke (Nasby), whom he first met in 1858 in Quincy, Illinois. In 1863 he wrote a letter to Locke in appreciation of one of Nasby's humorous articles, and ended the letter with this inquiry: "Why don't you come to Washington and see me?" Locke accepted the invitation and spent a delightful hour with the President, during which we may imagine the two humorists "swapped stories" to their hearts' content.

The President visited the telegraph office one morning. As he entered the room he saw George Low, one of the junior operators, at work cleaning a blue vitriol battery. "Well, sonny, mixing the juices, eh?" the President inquired. Then sitting down and adjusting his spectacles, which were especially made with short spring ends to clasp the sides of his head just back of his eyes, he became aware that all the operators were busy, and a smile broke over his countenance as he remarked: "Gentlemen, this is fast day, and I am pleased to observe that you are working as fast as you can; the proclamation was mine, and that is my interpretation of its bearing upon you. Now, we will have a little talk with Governor Morton, at Indianapolis. I want to give him a lesson in geography. Bowling Green affair I set him all right upon; now I will tell him something about Muldraugh Hill. Morton is a good fellow, but at times he is the skeeredest man I know of."

Earlier in the same month Lincoln, accompanied by Mr. Seward, dropped into the telegraph office with a pleasant "Good morning. What news?" Wilson replied, "Good news, because none." Whereupon Lincoln rejoined, "Ah, my young friend, that rule does not always hold good, for a fisherman does not consider it good luck when he can't get a bite."

Tinker records that one day Secretary Seward, who was not renowned as a joker, said he had been told that a short time before, on a street crossing, Lincoln had been seen to turn out in the mud to give a colored woman a chance to pass. "Yes," said Lincoln, "it has been a rule of my life that if people would not turn out for me, I would turn out for them. Then you avoid collisions."

On one occasion an official letter was received from John Wintrup, the operator at Wilmington, Delaware, on the route of the military line from Washington to Fort Monroe. Wintrup is still living in Philadelphia. His signature was written in a rather bold hand with the final letter quite large, almost like a capital, and ending in flourishes which partly obscured the name itself. Lincoln's eye dropped on this letter as it lay on the cipher-desk, and after satisfying his curiosity as to the peculiar signature he said: "That reminds me of a short-legged man in a big overcoat, the tail of which was so long that it wiped out his footprints in the snow."

A Sable Hero*

EVEN among those who have had the opportunity of watching the rare wild creatures, two things still stand in the way of our larger knowledge, namely, our hunting and our prejudice. It is simply impossible for the man who chases through the woods with dogs and rifles, intent on killing his game, ever to understand an animal. As well expect the barbarian who puts a village to fire and slaughter to understand the peaceful spirit of the people whom he destroys in their terror and confusion. It is not simply that the hunter is limited in knowledge by his own pursuits and interests, but the animals themselves are different; when you meet them in a place where they are often hunted they show an entirely different side of their nature—much wilder than when you meet them peacefully in the solitudes. And the man who goes to the woods with a preconceived idea that animals of the same species are all alike, that they are governed solely by instinct and show no individual wit or variation, merely binds a thick veil of prejudice over his eyes and blunders blindly along, missing every significant little thing which makes the animal interesting.

I was still some hundreds of yards from the edge of the bluff when a sharp ka-ka! made me turn quickly. From some pine woods behind me two crows darted out and rushed for the bluff, crying a loud warning at every flap of their wings. Whether they were sentinels or not, I do not know; but they certainly knew where the flock was hidden, all unconscious of danger, and the moment I appeared running for the bluff they darted in ahead of me to give the alarm. I watched them curiously as they sped straight for the spot, struggling desperately against the gale and sounding the danger-note in a continuous cry. I looked to see the flock rise clamoring over the bluff; but they were hidden too deep to hear, and the wind carried away the sentinels' alarm.

The two watchmen had not forgotten their caution and were evidently aiming to pass well out of range; but they forgot the gale, and in every squall they were pushed steadily to leeward. As they crossed in front of me a gust of wind flung them up almost over my head. The gun spoke once, and the leader tumbled headlong at my feet. The second barrel missed fire, and the other crow whirled in a panic over my head and darted back for the woods whence he had come.

I was running forward, when again the sharp ka-ka! ka-ka! sounded behind me; and I turned to see the second crow heading like an arrow for the bluff, sounding his alarm-note as he came on. I stopped again to watch with intense interest as he neared the flock. He was closer to the ground this time and flying more swiftly; but again he made the same sad blunder. The gale drove him steadily to leeward, and as he crossed before me a furious blast hurled him up over my head. The gun-sight covered him swiftly; and then, so near was he, I saw his wild, frightened eyes looking straight into mine along the shining gun-barrels. What he thought or felt, who can tell? There, just beyond, he saw his fellow-sentinel lying still, a drop of bright red clinging to the point of his dark beak, the rough wind ruffling his glossy blue-black feathers; here beneath him was the man who had done it, who could do it again; and there——

He whirled wildly at thought of the unconscious flock and sounded the alarm-cry at the top of his lungs. Had I pressed the trigger curling snugly under my finger, that cry to others to save themselves would have been his last. However poor and blind the understanding behind those frightened eyes, he could still see a duty to his fellows and be faithful, crying out to them to escape even at the terrible moment when death reached up from below to cut him down. It all occurred in an instant, and in that instant I had some thoughts and a whole lot of feelings, and the first and last of them was that a man must not shoot a bird like that. Slowly the gun came down; my eyes followed him with wonder and admiration as panic seized him again at sight of the man and his dead mate, and he whirled away on the squall.

The crows heard him this time and gave heed on the instant. How much did he understand of what he had done? That is a question which only a crow could answer. Only a poor hungry crow, of course, and we don't know what goes on in his head. But when a soldier on the outpost jumps to answer a call like that, we understand exactly where to place him.

Our New Serial Story

"THE MISCHIEF-MAKERS"

Strong, typically American, full of human nature, and with many charming characters, Begins in The Christian Herald of Dec. 11.

Saved to the Uttermost

Editor of The Christian Herald: Do you remember sending me a Bible two years ago, to give to a man who was going to State prison for murder committed when under the influence of liquor? That man has been saved, soul and body, by faithfully reading that book. A week ago he was let out on parole, a saved man. You should be glad you were able to give a poor lost soul such good counsel. I am glad you made it possible for me to give it to him. He had a dear wife who stood by him through all and he appreciates all that has been done for him. Oh, the power of God is wonderful!

"DEFECTIVE HEARING"

Unseen Comfort

A. O. Leonard INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Invisible Antiseptic Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. I have just gotten out a new Ear Drum that is a great improvement over my original Drum. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. Do not confound this Drum and my method with any failures you may have tried. My Principle is different; my method is also different, and they are the most successful of any thing offered for aid to Hearing. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. Absolutely out of sight when worn. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I do not make absurd and impossible claims. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

No Christmas in New York Schools

A YEAR ago, the Hebrew residents of New York and Brooklyn made an effort to induce the Board of Education to direct that no hymn or carol containing the name of Christ or mention of Christmas should be sung in the public schools of the metropolis. The plea was that our schools were non-sectarian, and that sectarian religious teaching was out of place in the schools. Last year's effort was only partially successful, but this year, the campaign for the exclusion of the name of Christ and all reference to Christmas from the schools, seems to have been only too successful.

When the announcement was made, a week ago, that the Board had decided to officially abolish Christ from the schools, a great wave of protest arose in all parts of the city. Orders were given by Mr. Frank R. Rix, general musical director, to the teachers that during the approaching Christmastide they must not permit pupils to sing any song that shall contain any word or phrase which would accentuate religious significance. It was further learned that all sectarian references, which include the name Christ and mention of Christmas, are being eliminated from the song books in use in the public schools, and the books are now undergoing revision.

This radical step by the Board of Education resulted from the protest a year ago of orthodox Hebrews, who appeared before the Board and complained that the Christmas festival as celebrated in the schools was essentially sectarian. At that time no action was taken. The matter was referred to the Committee on Elementary Schools, of which Abraham Stern is chairman, and that committee reported recently in favor of eliminating all sectarian references from the song books. The report was adopted by the Board of Superintendents.

"The teachers are not permitted to use their discretion," Musical Director Rix explained. "They are to follow the rule to the letter and teach no songs of Christmas. The net result will be a radical change in the manner of Christmas celebration this year."

Just how far the present crusade against the Christian religion in the public schools will be permitted to go is a matter for conjecture. It may, however, go much further, and in their zeal the advocates of entire secularization may try to bring about the revision of all the school-books now in use, with a view to eliminating the name of Christ and all reference to Christianity. Their programme includes "forbidding the singing in public schools of hymns, the reading of religious treatises or books other than the Bible, and elimination of sectarian topics from essays and during exercises at the beginning of the winter vacation."

The new crusade against Christianity in the schools promises to become a great and burning question in the near future.

THE STRAIT GATE*

REPROOF to those who regarded the entrance into the kingdom of Christ as a light and easy matter had to be administered. Christ administered it with the tenderness and gentleness characteristic of him. It was natural, when men heard that they might become followers of Christ without obeying the complicated and onerous regulations of the Jewish law, that ignorant men and moral lepers might enter his kingdom, that they should assume that all barriers were thrown down, and that there were no tests of fitness. Opposed to this notion were these startling words of Christ, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in and shall not be able." It must have been a new idea to those who had been listening to the new teacher that the gate of entrance was narrow, and that entrance might involve a struggle. Those who, listening to modern evangelists, imagine that they have only to hold up the hand to indicate that they are willing to "accept" Christ, would do well to ponder these words.

Our Lord did not have such a conception of his person and mission as this of being a mere candidate for acceptance or rejection. He knew he was a king and never lost sight of his royalty. He imposed conditions on those who would follow him. One man was told that it would be necessary to sell all that he had in order to enter; another eminent for his position and learning was told that he must become as a little child and must actually begin his life by being born again, and another was bidden to sever his connection with his family so completely as to absent himself from his father's funeral. True, Christ was willing to accept sinners, willing to receive even those who had incurred social disgrace, but in those cases the candidates possessed the requirements that the rich man and the Pharisee did not have. They were the essentials and with them Christ would not dispense.

Christ required sincerity and earnestness. A man must not profess to seek and yet not be willing to make sacrifices. He must feel the value of what he was seeking, and must be ready to give up anything that would hinder him. He required humility. His disciples must not set up their own opinions in opposition to him. He required above all things the forsaking of sin. Those he admitted might feel that they could not comply, but they must at least desire to comply, and must gratefully accept his help in the struggle to comply. And they must trust absolutely in him as their Saviour and King. These were reasonable conditions, but to many they would be so hard that they could not enter the strait gate without a struggle.

Total Prohibition in Finland

NEWS from Finland shows remarkable results since the introduction of universal suffrage for adults of both sexes. The Finnish Legislature consists of a single chamber of 200 members. Fifty-six per cent. of the voters at the last election in towns, and 50 per cent. in the rural districts were women. Nineteen women were elected members of the chamber. It has just passed a drastic act for the total prohibition of spirits, wine, beer and alcohol, which may be kept only for medical and technical purposes and for the use of troops. Even the use of wine for the communion service is forbidden. No one may keep alcoholic drinks in his house unless he can prove that they were in his possession before the act was passed. The police have full rights of search and the penalties vary from $20 fine to penal servitude for three years. There is no provision for loss of capital in breweries, distilleries or private houses.

Baroness Gripenberg, one of the best known women members, said that in dealing with a question of this vital social importance it was quite time "to leave reason aside and let sentiment prevail." It is not expected that the law will ever come into operation, for the veto of the Czar is regarded as certain.

BEGAN YOUNG

Had "Coffee Nerves" from Youth

"When very young I began using coffee and continued up to the past six months," writes a Texas girl.

"I had been exceedingly nervous, thin and very sallow. After quitting coffee and drinking Postum Food Coffee about a month my nervousness disappeared and has never returned. This is the more remarkable as I am a primary teacher and have kept right on with my work.

"My complexion now is clear and rosy, my skin soft and smooth. As a good complexion was something I had greatly desired, I feel amply repaid even though this were the only benefit derived from drinking Postum.

"Before beginning its use I had suffered greatly from indigestion and headache. These troubles are now unknown.

"Best of all, I changed from coffee to Postum without the slightest inconvenience; did not even have a headache. Have known coffee drinkers who were visiting me, to use Postum a week without being aware that they were not drinking coffee.

"I have known several to begin the use of Postum and drop it because they did not boil it properly. After explaining how it should be prepared they have tried it again and pronounced it delicious."

The Child Prophet

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IT is evident that Samuel was very young when his ministry began, for "his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice." It was evidently a thing out of the common order that one so young should be permitted to minister, but Eli recognized it as the Lord's will, and "blessed Elkanah and his wife, . . . for the loan which they lent to the Lord." So it was that "the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord before Eli." Whatever Eli directed, Samuel was ready to do, but it was to please Eli, for "Samuel did not yet know the Lord."

It is not uncommon for parents to be much mistaken about the spiritual state of their children. Some children have naturally a kind of religious tendency, obey easily, have very few fits of naughtiness, and naturally take up religious language from those who surround them: yet many of these children do not yet "know the Lord," there has been no real coming in contact with God. There are others whose natural disposition is just the reverse—they are self-willed, inclined to question and oppose, contradictory, and without natural reverence. No one dreams of counting these to be converted children until some very real change does take place. Yet it sometimes happens that these latter have more real understanding of their own hearts, and more real acquaintance with God than those who are naturally more docile. Samuel's unblamable life as a child was no proof that he knew the Lord, and his ministry was "before Eli," not yet before the Lord.

"And the Word of the Lord was precious (or scarce) in those days; there was no open vision." The history of the previous chapter accounts for this. The sons of Eli, who seems to have been both judge and priest, were "sons of Belial; they knew not the Lord" (Chap. 2: 12), and their life was so scandalous that "men abhorred the offering of the Lord." God had sent "a man of God" to warn Eli, and show him that he was responsible for the sins of his sons. True, Eli had reproved them, but only with weak words; he had still permitted them to exercise their office, and bring the most terrible reproach upon the Lord through their life of sin. God sees sin far otherwise than we do; it must have been an awful moment for Eli when the messenger of God said to him, "Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice and at mine offering, which I have commanded in my habitation; and honorest thy sons above me, to make yourselves fat with the chiefest of all the offerings of Israel my people?"

Much as Eli had grieved over the sins of his sons, he had probably not recognized that he was honoring these licentious young men above the holy God whom they dishonored; yet such was his sin before God. When those who are in the ministry are unholy in their lives, worldly, selfish, money-loving, slaves of position, of pleasure, etc., God counts this as the honoring themselves or their children above him. To be permitted to serve God is the greatest honor which can be bestowed upon man; if this service does not absorb all else, if it is not in itself enough of position, of honor, of pleasure, then it is clear that whatever else divides the heart is honored above God.

Thank God, it is not often we hear now of inebriate ministers of the Gospel, or of immorality in connection with the ministry. But, oh, how often we hear of worldliness, of evil temper, of pride, of debt among ministers as well as others! No wonder, then, that the Word of God is "precious;" no wonder that there is generally so great a lack of power. The writer of Ps. 74 says (ver. 9): "We see not our signs; there is no more any prophet; neither is there among us any that knoweth how long." No punishment, no trial can be greater to a child than the refusal of his father to speak to him; and this was Israel's position at this time.

30,000 Housewives

have, during the past year, consulted by letter the editors of Success Magazine's Home Departments on hundreds of topics of the most varied character connected with their daily lives.

45,000 Family Financiers have consulted by letter the financial experts of Success Magazine's "Investors' Department," asking advice as to the investment of their surplus funds in amounts ranging from one hundred to fifty thousand dollars. We are taught from childhood the art of making money; but one most essential thing has been neglected in the average person's education, and that is how to take care of the money after it has been earned. That is why there are so few very rich and so many very poor. The Investors' Department of Success Magazine educates its readers how to safely invest their money. This department is a regular feature of the magazine, and is conducted by one of many years' experience in the financial world.

The World's Crime Against China

A great international crime has been committed and traced to Europe's commercial greed—the Christian peoples are demoralizing the Asiatic races through the opium traffic. In China, India, and Burmah, the bodies and souls of countless multitudes are being starved, and the life blood sapped from these ancient races by the curse of opium.

Success Magazine's Special Representative, Samuel Merwin, has traveled around the globe to gather all the facts concerning this world iniquity. He tells of his travels in the interior of China, his strenuous search for the truth, and of the deadly effect of the great curse, in a most fascinating series of articles. The story—startling, astounding—yes, appalling, is extremely interestingly told in Mr. Merwin's own excellent way. This single editorial feature for 1907 has cost Success Magazine nearly $10,000.

Our Fiction

Clean, delightful, cleverly told stories—the kind you will remember and will tell your friends about—are an important feature of Success Magazine. Here are some that will appear in the next few numbers: "Uranus's Mother," by Ethel Watts-Mumford Grant; "The Uncertain Heart," by Elliot Flowers; "Panim's Little Brother," by Alvis Dunbar; "The Wooing at Mexico," by Chauncey Thomas; "That Dog Sherry" by Charles Battell Loomis. Besides these, we will publish a new story by F. Marion Crawford—one of the most fascinating that this author has ever written.

"Lentala," a most fascinating adventure story of the South Seas, by W. J. Morrow, is now running as a serial in Success Magazine. While absolutely different in plot and characteristics from Robert Louis Stevenson's great story, "Treasure Island," it belongs to the same class of delightful, stirring, absorbing fiction as that great "classic," and is being read with almost equal interest by boys and girls as well as the younger members of Success families.

The Noontide Hour

The Fulton Street Prayer Meeting

THERE was prayer in the early morning,
Ere they went on their toilsome way,
And prayer in the quiet evening
At the close of the weary day.
But what of the busy noontide,
When the whirl and the rush were on?
What time was there that a man could spare
To commune with the Holy One?

And yet there was need incessant,
For hearts that would gladly seek
For strength to bear life's toil and care,
Oft found they were growing weak.
But one who was toiling for others,
Whose life was o'erflowing with care,
Had faith to try, as the days passed by,
The balm of the noontide prayer.

As they gathered there in that quiet room,
What an uplift came to all!
The Master was near in that atmosphere
And the blessing seemed to fall.
They sought for the needed strength to bear,
And they sought it not in vain.
Oh, there was power in that noontide hour,
To help in the fearful strain.

And messages came from all over the land,
Asking prayer for the wandering ones.
"Oh, pray for our daughters gone astray,"
"Oh, pray for our wayward sons."
And the Father who hears the prayer of faith
Has honored his children well; [there,
And the answers to prayer that were given
Eternity only will tell.

Oh, who can count the joys that have come
In the fifty years now flown, [heaven
The strength that was given, the foretastes of
In that noontide hour alone?
And who can measure the power for good,
Or the influence pure and sweet,
Of the voice of prayer that has risen there
In the heart of that busy street?

"A Wonderful Work"

OUR readers will be interested in this most appreciative letter from a visitor to India who was greatly impressed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S orphanage work:

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I am writing especially this morning to tell you of the wonderful work that has been done in India, as a result of the munificent gifts which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent out from time to time. I saw orphans by the hundred, possibly the thousand, who were receiving their support from CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, and I want to tell you that they are coming on wonderfully well. I visited scores of schools and orphanages in India, and in nearly every one of them the principal or missionary would ask those to rise who were supported by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, and in many cases nearly all—in some instances all of them—would stand upon their feet. It is a wonderful thing to be able to reach so many lives; to fit young people who otherwise, if they lived, would become beggars, to be intellectual and high-minded citizens and active Christians.

Hoping that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be able to continue this noble ministry, not only in India and China and Turkey, the lands where I saw most of your work, but in other lands where there may be similar need, I am, etc.,

When Alabama Went Dry

The Alabama State Senate at Montgomery was a scene of extraordinary excitement recently, when the Statutory Prohibition Bill was passed by a vote of 32 to 2. Women and children crowded the galleries and corridors and even invaded the Senate floor itself, pushing the Senators from their seats and expressing their enthusiasm in shouts and cheers. Lieutenant Governor Gray was powerless to control the crowd. After the bill passed the women began to sing "Praise God, from Whom All Blessings Flow," and as the sacred song swelled in volume, the legislators stood up, uncovered their heads and joined in the singing.

A lamp, like a fireplace, gives the home look.

MACBETH'S Pearl Glass chimneys give "the light that shines for you."

I make them carefully, by measurements to a hair's breadth, for all sorts and sizes of lamps. That's why they give perfect combustion, and why they save oil, and don't break, and save their cost many times over in the course of a year. But get the chimney made to fit your lamp.

My Lamp Chimney Catalogue is full of practical suggestions about lamps and chimneys and wicks and oils, and how to keep them in order. It tells which chimney will give the best light, with least breakage, on every kind of lamp. It saves a great deal of bother and money. I gladly mail it, free, to anyone who writes for it. Address

Mathematician Figures Out the Food Question

If anyone requires a clear head it is the teacher of mathematics. He must reason in the abstract, as it were, and full concentration of mind is necessary if correct results are to be forthcoming.

An Ohio man writes:

"I am a teacher of mathematics and for fifteen years prior to four years ago, I either took a lunch composed of cold sandwiches, pickles, etc., to school or hurried home and quickly ate a hot dinner.

"The result was I went to my afternoon work feeling heavy, dull of brain and generally out of sorts. Finally I learned about Grape-Nuts and began to use it for my noonday lunch.

"From the first I experienced a great change for the better. The heavy, unpleasant feeling and sour stomach caused by the former diet disappeared. The drowsy languor and disinclination to work soon gave way to a brightness and vim in my afternoon work, a feeling entirely new to me.

"My brain responded promptly to the requirements put upon it, and what is of more importance, the results have been lasting and more satisfactory, the longer I have used Grape-Nuts as a food.

"My wife had been suffering from weak stomach, accompanied by sick headaches, nearly all her life. She is invariably relieved of these when she sticks to Grape-Nuts, either eaten dry or with milk. Her stomach has gradually grown stronger and her headaches less frequent since she began to eat Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason" Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Courageous Testimony*

THOSE early disciples of Christ must have astonished the rulers and judges of their time by the unexpected boldness they displayed. Their desertion of him at the time of his arrest and trial and execution, naturally gave the impression that they were ashamed of him and were concerned about their own safety. It looked as if by killing him, an effectual end was made of the movement, and that nothing was to be feared from his followers. But suddenly the smouldering fire visible in the country districts, the Galilean villages and the desert of Petra, which appeared to be crushed out by the crucifixion, sprang into flame and in the capital itself demonstrated its reality and power. Christ had proved his wisdom and foresight by saying, "It is expedient for you that I go away." His words were justified. The timid disciples became courageous and openly preached him as the Messiah and Saviour. What had worked the change? Something must be allowed for the effect of the resurrection, but the main difference was due to the descent of the Holy Spirit. They were new men, because the Holy Spirit had taken possession of them, giving them boldness and a message that could not be resisted.

That power was not restricted to apostolic times. It has been exercised in every generation since that time. The persecutions of the Roman emperors brought forth specimens of it by the thousand. The fights in the Coliseum, the burning bodies in Nero's gardens testified abundantly to the martyr spirit, and from that period down to our time when missionaries and converts perished in China rather than deny Christ, there has never been a call for martyrs that did not find a prompt response. That, too, not from strong men alone; delicate women and even children have chosen death rather than the shame of denying Christ.

The same power is accessible still. It may be supposed that it is not needed in a Christian land, but there are few Christians even here and now, that have not felt at some time in their lives the difficulty of giving strong testimony for Christ. It requires boldness in a school for a boy to face the ridicule of his companions, for a workingman to stand before the gibes of his fellow workers, for a student in a secular college, or a soldier or sailor among his ungodly comrades to declare himself a follower of Christ. That, it may be said, is a different thing from martyrdom; but the difference is only in degree. It is of such that martyrs are made. The Holy Spirit is the source of the power in the one case as in the other, and it is given, as it is needed, to those who are willing to use it. The man who will face the fire of ridicule is the man who, if required, would face the fire or the sword, being endowed and supported by the Holy Spirit.

"Overboard"—A Fanciful Sketch by Admiral Sigsbee

"When I Was a Midshipman"

By Rear-Admiral Chas. D. Sigsbee, United States Navy

ILLUSTRATED WITH ORIGINAL DRAWINGS BY THE AUTHOR

Drawings copyrighted, 1907, by Louis Klopsch

A "Beach-Comber," by Admiral Sigsbee

IT is a long stretch of time since I was a midshipman, yet it seems but a day. I was retired from active service in January last, and already I can hardly realize that I passed through all the activities, incidents and emergencies of forty-seven years of active service. Nevertheless, when I settle down to recall the incidents of my active career I am overburdened by the details. Once I was asked how long I could lecture on a certain subject. I replied that I could talk for a week, if only somebody would contradict me occasionally, or engage in conversation on my topic. Details multiply when discussed jointly. Perhaps it is just as well, when writing for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that I occupy my field quite alone, else I might overcrowd the pages of that excellent journal. If any officer of my rank were to write his career in full, a single volume would be hardly more than a mere synopsis. Very many yarns would have to be omitted, as well as much philosophy. To keep me in a groove, as against my own fears, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has suggested detached topics for treatment. Thus curbed I shall venture to go ahead.

Rear-Admiral Chas. D. Sigsbee

I entered the navy from Albany, N. Y., in September, 1859, at the age of fourteen. That was very young to enter on a life work concerning which I had hardly so much as imaginings. In large part, however, my age was my good fortune, for I afterwards reached most of my grades and positions at an uncommonly early period of naval life. At eighteen I was watch and division officer of a fine ship in the Civil War, and at nineteen in charge of a division of guns in hot battle. At twenty-three I was lieutenant-commander, the naval rank that corresponds to major in the army. At twenty-seven I was executive officer of a fine ship—next to the captain and his relief when he was absent. I was twenty-nine when I got my first command. At twenty-five I got married, and that, according to my opinion, was the pluckiest thing any man could do. At least I was more scared at the hardihood of the deed than at any other prospective event of my life.

When I entered the navy there was but one avenue of approach to a commission in the line of the navy. That avenue led through the Naval Academy, with all the horrors of an education. That I regarded as an imposition, but, led by my father, I went blindly to the Academy at Annapolis, Md. By hook or by crook, smiling fortune enabled me to pass my physical and mental examinations for entrance, and I was duly entered on the books of the Academy for what I was worth—and under the title of acting midshipman. Later that title was changed for all to midshipman. I hardly knew what I was or why I had come there, but the buffetings of official life soon shaped my wits as to all that. I liked much fun and little study. If my memory serves me well I was rather towed along by favoring conditions, yet when I got through, I knew the course of study fairly well. I learned more from intuitive observation than from books. Commonly, I did not know my lesson well when I entered the recitation room, but I had it when I left. I got it from the recitations of others. Such was my system. While in that way I gained a knowledge of the course, I lost numbers in my class. I have regretted those early tendencies ever since, and much study has been done to repair my imperfect foundations. Much of my time was given to voluntary sketching, chiefly caricature, for which I gained a pretty good reputation. In fact, I afterwards, for a short time, made a fad of drawing for the illustrated periodicals. Many years ago I dropped my sketching on the ground that it was well for the "shoemaker to stick to his last." At present I should no more try to sketch than to try to solve the following problem that was once presented to me officially:

"What is the angle made with the horizon by a line drawn tangent to both horns of the cusp of the moon when the moon is two days old?"

I let another official solve that problem, just as I now leave the field of sketching clear for better artists.

It is seen that I entered the Academy before the Civil War. Midshipmen were assembled there from each congressional district of the United States, and many were from the South. Civil war was not foreseen. We were a band of good fellows, only fitfully concerned with politics. Our friendships were not based on sectional lines, and many have been resumed and strengthened since the war. Slavery was a topic to be kept in the background. The Southern fellows were the most generous and loyal of friends, but outspoken opposition to slavery they could not tolerate. They were firm and honest in their belief in that institution. When the Civil War was imminent the midshipmen tended to divide into groups, but courtesy and friendship were maintained, and this is pleasant to recall in these days. The breaking up, when the Southern fellows resigned and went South, produced many a heart bursting as good friends parted, some of them to meet in battle afterwards. Indeed, it was impossible for some of the Southern fellows to judge from day to day just what course they should take. The academy remained at Annapolis until a few Union regiments had arrived—notably the First Rhode Island and the Seventh New York. Then, being overrun by troops, the whole organization was removed to Newport, R. I., where it remained till the close of the war. In comparatively recent years some of my old Southern classmates, in remembrance of the old days, have asked me to take a kindly interest in their sons when the latter have come into association with me.

The Old "Constitution," Now a Practice-Ship

At the academy we had our official regulations already provided for us. The hazing of the old, according to traditions required a reasonable degree of "persecuting," so we proceeded to appreciate the wisdom of those regulations which protected us in very [illegible]

THE WONDROUS BIRTH

A CHRISTMAS SERMON
By Robert Stuart MacArthur
Minister at Calvary Church since 1870

TEXT — MATTHEW 2: 1
"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea"

ONCE more we are approaching the sacred festivities of the Christmas-tide. With joyful songs and with gladsome greetings we celebrate the birth-festival of our divine Lord and holy Saviour. Once more, with mingled gratitude, hope and love, we bend over the cradle of the infant Redeemer. Once more the Christ-child charms our hearts, beautifies our homes, sweetens our lives, and sanctifies our loves. Once more we tell the old and ever new story of this wondrous birth; and once more we learn the blessed lessons which this story teaches and gloriously translates into our workaday lives. Our Christmas songs will never cease until they become the songs of celestial choirs when this earthly life is exalted to its heavenly realizations. The song which the angels sang the night the Christ was born shall echo through the world until it shall become a part of the song sung by "the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thundering, saying, Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

The Facts of this Wondrous Birth

It becomes us greatly to emphasize the fact of the unique birth of the Son of God. In this joyous Christmas festival we celebrate the incarnation, the enfleshment of the second Person of the blessed Trinity. The incarnation of the Son of God is the most wonderful fact in human history. His equality with God the Father he did not consider as a possession to be tenaciously held; but he emptied himself, took the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man. This is the unique fact in the history of earth, and perhaps also in the history of the universe of God. No more wonderful event, we may be well assured, ever engaged the thought of the loftiest archangel. The incarnation of Jesus Christ was the fulfilment of divine prophecy variously uttered through the ages; it was also the realization of the dreams of classic poets, and the unconscious prophecies of heathen philosophers.

The Incarnation

It was a high honor that man should have been made in the image of God; this element in human birth puts a crown of glory on the brow of the human race. But it was unspeakable condescension on the part of God, and an ineffable honor in the experience of man, that God should have assumed the form of man whom he had created. The incarnation of Jesus Christ is the centre and turning-point in the history of the world. All the great events in history previous to his coming converged to the cradle and cross of Jesus Christ; all the great events of history since his coming have diverged from his cradle and his cross. His cradle is the pivotal point in the story of the world. The Christmas festival is the grand jubilee of children in every Christian land. Our gifts to one another at this season are but the faint shadow of God's infinite love in the unspeakable gift of his only begotten Son. No one can ever estimate the degree of joy which has come to men of all classes and conditions, as they contemplate the birth of the holy child Jesus. The Christmas-tide kindles in mid-winter a fire of love, gratitude, and joy on the altar of every home and heart in which Jesus finds room. It was a great idea of Dionysius the Little, when he made the birth of Jesus the beginning of a new era. Every man, whether he be agnostic or atheist, who dates a letter, gives testimony to the glorious fact of the birth of Jesus Christ, Son of Mary and Son of God.

It is most fitting that increasing emphasis by all true believers be given now to the unique fact of this wondrous birth. In places high and low it is now denied. Its supernatural character is now entirely rejected by many critics of the New Testament. The rejection of this doctrine, however, has called into the field of debate brave knights of the cross, who are beautifully uniting profound scholarship and loving consecration in their defense of the doctrine of the virgin birth of our divine Lord and Redeemer. It has ever been true that the stanchest defenders of the doctrines of revelation have been summoned to the field as brave knights of the truth when the truth has been denied; it is still true that there is no room for the Christ of the Evangelists in the philosophy of some critics, even as there was no room for the holy child Jesus in the inn at Bethlehem. It may be that science itself will rise up to be a witness to the reality of the virgin birth of Jesus. It is truly wonderful how true science to-day is striving, in the persons of trained scientists, to support the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and of the resurrection of the body. In like manner biological science has come forward in its tentative affirmations regarding parthenogenesis as a witness to the possibilities of the virgin birth of our Lord, in harmony with laws of nature recently discovered, which this new science has already partially demonstrated. Already demonstrations of this possibility have been secured in lower forms of life. They may be fully proved later even in the higher forms of life.

"The glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid"

The Time of the Wondrous Birth

Chronologically we do not know the exact date of our Lord's birth; probably we never shall know. It does not seem to have been the design of God that we should know Christ after the flesh with complete fulness of detail; had it been God's purpose to give us this information, the revelation could easily have been ample. The observance of the birth-festival by the early church was comparatively late. There are reasons for this lateness of observance; there was no corresponding festival in the Old Testament, as in the case of Easter; the church naturally emphasized first the death and resurrection of Christ; and there is no date given in the Gospel history of his birth. Scholars at different periods have selected almost every month in the year as the date of the birth. It is thus certain that we know neither the day, the month, nor the year of this event. It is certain, however, that Dionysius, who was a Scythian by birth and an abbot at Rome in the year A.D. 526, and who placed the birth of Christ in the 754th year of Rome, made an error of at least four years in his reckoning. Christ was born, we know, before the death of Herod the Great, which event took place about the first of April in the year of Rome 750. This date is definitely fixed by an eclipse of the moon. Our present date ought, therefore, to be four years earlier than the figures given for this present year. The 20th of April and the 20th of May have been observed as the day of our Lord's birth; and the 6th of January has been kept by others as the date both of the birth and the baptism of Jesus. The 25th of December was not generally observed until the fourth century. We find it so observed in Rome in the year 360; in Antioch in 380, and in Alexandria in 430.

Heathen Festivals

Without doubt, the Christmas festival was a transformation of a series of heathen festivals which were celebrated in the month of December. These festivals commemorated the golden age of freedom and equality; they were great holidays for children and slaves. The early Christians, with worldly wisdom, took these heathen festivals and gave them a Christian application. One element in the heathen observance was honor to the unconquered sun, which, on the 25th of December, after the winter solstice, begins anew his triumphant course. The early Christians exalted this idea to the birth of Christ, the Sun of righteousness, and the Light of the World. They saw in the return of the natural sun a prophecy of the birth of him who is the true Light of the World. In our own day we have seen similar transformations; we have encouraged converted Chinese to observe the Chinese New Year with Christian ceremonies and with a Christian significance; thus their New Year is made to teach Christian truths, and to be prophetic of the loftiest spiritual realities.

The birth of Christ was the time of the world's greatest need. The world had tried to save itself, and sufficiencies, but in the main it worked well. Occasionally our code collided with the regulations and drove us to leeward on the official rocks, whence we came off in a damaged condition. One requirement of our private code has always been characteristic of the navy. A lie was not permitted on any pretext whatever. Lying was the unpardonable sin. No man could surmount the reputation of even a single lie, whether told with good or bad intention. Once a liar always a liar—that was the rule.

In those days sailing ships were still used as cruisers. In fact, we had more sailing ships than steamships in commission. Sail seamanship was paramount. Efficiency in that gave leading quality to the officer. Seamanship gathered from books was regarded with suspicion by many of the older officers. Education by training was given great weight even in the lowest class at the Academy. We always had sailing training-ships at the Academy for frequent drills. In summer we made cruises in them, either at home or abroad. I have worked aloft until my fingers were benumbed beyond flexure, this in the winter drills at Newport. At least that kind of rigor taught us how a sailor would feel under the same conditions. There were other drills a-plenty—infantry, artillery, great guns, small sword, broadsword, rowing, sailing, etc. Gymnastics and sports were not yet organized, yet we had gymnastics, baseball and football in happy-go-lucky fashion. In only one respect was football organized. It was morally certain that one reckless midshipman would rush into a puddle to secure the ball, so we organized to let him do that rushing. We had prayers every morning and church service on Sundays. Our spending-money was one dollar a month, which I commonly invested in macaroons—when I got the dollar. It was given only to the deserving.

Grog was still served out to the seamen twice daily on board ship, but the grog ration was abolished while I was at the Academy. Punishment with the cat-o'-nine-tails had been abolished, but other cruel punishments were permitted. I saw men lashed up inside the lower rigging "spread-eagle fashion." I also saw them gagged, bucked or triced up by the wrists to the deck beams overhead. No cruelty is now permitted. All punishments are carefully formulated and limited by law and regulation.

In 1859 the slave trade afloat was still active. A considerable number of our war vessels were constantly engaged in its suppression. In that year they captured twelve vessels and rescued more than 3,000 Africans.

The total annual naval appropriation was $10,500,000, stated in round numbers. Now we are spending that much for each of the 20,000-ton battleships allowed by the last Congress, taking the ship in full commission. But other navies have progressed also, and safety now lies in great constructions with concentrated power. Let us hope that this progress will work for peace between nations. That such is the tendency I truly believe.

Our heaviest vessels were the steamers of the Wabash, Merrimac, Minnesota class, which led in their day and were copied abroad. The Merrimac was taken by the Confederates when they possessed themselves of the Norfolk Navy Yard, and was converted into the famous ironclad Merrimac that fought the Monitor. That action began an epoch of armored, turreted war vessels, the highest type of which is the projected 20,000 ton battleship. We still had on the stocks and as receiving ships some sailing line-of-battle ships. All of our steam vessels had full sail power, and depended chiefly on sail for propulsion. Steam was only auxiliary. Our seamen averaged much older in age than those of the present day, and, in general, were of a different type.

"Reefing Topsails"

We then had a far greater proportion of aliens in the service. Now we have 82 per cent. of native born and 93 per cent. of native and naturalized citizens. In conversation with a wag of a shipmate, when I was an ensign, I said: "The officers of that British flagship were bragging recently that but three men on board are not British born." "Why do they brag?" said he; "we, too, have only about three who are not British born, but we don't go round bragging about it." Those old seamen were masters of their trade in their day, but the modern man-of-war's man is more intellectual and far-reaching in his possibilities of training. Couldn't we made the typical old-time sailor an open-hearted, easy-going, generous and courageous fellow. He had his faults, perhaps, but they were things apart from his courage. By reason of his environment and mode of life, he was not unlikely, in later life, to be enough of a "character" to furnish food for tradition. I sailed with some whose sayings and doings have passed down through all grades of the service. For example, I sailed with the renowned boatswain M——, who, of course, came from the seaman class; also with old "Charlie" N—— and old "Tom" H——.

In his yarns that boatswain was unique. He would cut loose from mathematics, and regard his hearers in a hurt way as though fearing that they might go so far as to doubt his word. He talked from one side of his mouth. Moreover, he was an excellent boatswain and was liked by everybody. Here is a specimen of his style that has been passed down:

"When I was cruising in the M —— in 1856—no, I'm a liar, it was in 1857—I was standing in the starboard gangway and the captain comes to me, and he says to me, says he, 'M——!' Says I to him, says I, 'Sir?' Says he to me, says he, 'M——, you're the only feller in this ship that I can trust.' Says I to him, says I, 'Ay, ay, sir, I know it, sir,'" etc.

One day old "Charlie" N——, captain of the forecastle, would have fallen overboard had he not been caught by a shipmate. The old philosopher merely growled under his breath: "What an awful hole I'd ha'e made in the water!" Old "Tom" H—— was a boatswain's mate, too fat to go aloft. He was a marvel of fanciful fact and figures. He always specified dates and places relating to his age and experiences, and declared that he was only forty-four years old. One day we midshipmen confronted him with his own figures, as related to one another of us from time to time.

SECRETARY TAFT IN MARTYRS' HALL

Secretary Taft Speaking at the Opening of the Chinese Y. M. C. A., Shanghai

"WE pledge ourselves that this great structure which you have erected shall be used perpetually to strengthen the brotherhood of man and to spread abroad the love of Jesus Christ." A man stood on a platform and uttered these words in perfect English. He was dressed in the costume of the Orient—robes of the finest silk. On his shaven head he wore the official hat of the Chinese mandarin and a long, glossy queue hung down his back. On one side of him sat other mandarins, similarly attired, and half the audience facing him were of his own nationality, Chinese, and Christians. To his right sat the Hon. William H. Taft, United States Secretary of War, and with him and facing him were other Americans and Occidentals of various nationalities. They were assembled in the Hall of the Martyrs in the splendid new building of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. at Shanghai on Tuesday, October 8. Built by American money and the united efforts of both nationalities, this magnificent institution, which has for its object the betterment of the youth in the great commercial metropolis of China, was formally dedicated and opened by Secretary Taft. It was significant in the widest sense that in a hall dedicated to the martyrs of the Christian faith in China—martyrs whose sufferings and death led to political complications, reprisals, war and the humiliation of the Chinese people—a Chinese official in the company and hearing of other government officials representing China with its 400,000,000 inhabitants, is able to make a pronouncement and a declaration of his own definite acknowledgment of the Christian religion. In this hall the faith of the martyrs is vindicated and their death brings forth fruit.

Taotai Y. C. Tong, delegate of the viceroy of the province in which Shanghai is situated (an ex-student of Columbia University and a man of culture), said: "From the generous support accorded this effort by my countrymen, it will be patent that we welcome all institutions and efforts which have for their object the propagation of moral ideas among the youth of this great commercial community. Temptation surrounds young men on every hand, and any institution which tends to negative or neutralize its effects deserves all praise and support from every one influenced by high ideals. The Chinese people, in particular, place a paramount value on all things connected with purity in family and filial existence. Therefore, this institution, which aims to foster and increase the exercise of those virtues, is worthy of our most sincere and lively consideration."

Standing in front of the American flag, with the yellow ensign of China draped alongside of it, Mr. Taft handed over to the chairman of the Chinese Y. M. C. A. the deeds of the property, so memorably dedicated to the service of Christianity. Secretary Taft's speech was translated into Chinese by the Chinese secretary, and has gone forth to the remotest confines of the empire, as have the utterances of the Chinese representatives on the same occasion. W. K.

[Since the foregoing was written, Mr. Taft has started on his homeward journey, across Siberia from Vladivostok. He has been enthusiastically welcomed in Russia, and high official honors were paid to him as the distinguished representative of the Western Republic].

A Mission Ship Injured

Missionary Christian Schmitt writes from Killinek, Labrador:

"Our mission ship Harmony met with an accident on the Labrador coast early in September—a broken shaft—and failed to reach this remotest station. This necessitated a long stay for me here, and now nearly three months have passed since Dr. Grenfell left us. Our agent in St. Johns, Newfoundland, sent another ship with supplies and to enable me to reach Nain this year; but the season is now far advanced and winter setting in, with frequent gales and snowstorms making navigation difficult and dangerous.

"With God's help, I hope to reach Nain all right in a week or so."

AFRICA'S WILD TRIBES WAITING

SIX and a half years have passed since Mr. Springer and myself landed at Beira, on the east coast of Africa. From there we went by rail some 204 miles to Umtali, in which section the most of our labors for the next five years were to be spent. But from the very first there was much of pioneering and exploring to be done. As the years sped on, there was even more of this. In 1906 we made an extended tour around the very outer edge of the district over which Mr. Springer was presiding elder, after which the way opened for us to take a tour of some 4,000 miles through the older sections of South Africa, thus giving us the opportunity to study both what had been done, where most had been accomplished, and also what might be done in fields wholly untouched.

One great difficulty was the funds. The first relief was when your CHRISTIAN HERALD readers sent the money to provide us with a native helper, Benjamin, whose services were invaluable to us all the way. At another time we were down to our last coin while at Broken Hill, and then came a check to me also from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, which tided us over another bad place. And in this way we learned some most important lessons of faith and trust in God.

We found the horrible slave traffic still in full blast in many sections of the interior, especially those sections assigned to Portugal, which are used by the Portuguese as the hunting-ground for slaves. We felt heart-sick at what we saw and heard, and cannot but cry out to the civilized nations, by whose support alone Portugal is permitted to carry on this bloody business. "How long, O Lord, how long?" But, thank God, the Portuguese are not carrying on the slave trade with the former ease and shamelessness. The Papist bishop's stone chair no longer stands on Loanda's shore, for the bishop to sit in and bless the slave ships as they leave the harbor.

One thing which impressed us most, as we made the long journey to the west coast, was the wonderful way in which God is opening up the interior, and the magnificent opportunities for the Christian Church to make paying investments in missionary enterprise. I verily believe there is no field so wholly heathen, yet so ripe for the harvesting. The fields of Africa are truly white for the harvest, and in many of the tribes there are absolutely no laborers. Would that I could describe the conditions of the Wakaonda country, with the richest copper district in the world, its gold and iron and tin, and no one knows yet how much more wealth, but in particular, its thousands of splendid Wakaonda, who are ready and waiting for a hearty reception of the Gospel! Shall we wait and let them learn all of the white man's vices first, and then try to piece up the fragments?

And there is the beautiful Bachokwe country, so high and mountainous that the fierce Bachokwe have never been conquered by the Portuguese. Up there you can find both ice and rubber. While the Portuguese dare not enter that country with their soldiers, they are sending their traders, who buy rubber and slaves with powder and rum. They are a superior, industrious and energetic tribe of savages. They were not very hospitable to us; but who can wonder? They only know the white man as a slave trader and a reprobate. Shall we wait until Portuguese rum has destroyed their independence and only a vestige of manhood is left? Missions ought to be established there in less than three years' time. And what of the Balunda, the Bangalla, the Baluba, and other tribes, whose fear of Portuguese invasion has made them too desperate for white men as yet to explore their fields? Who will go there? He who goes will win rich rewards.

Now is the time of the white invasion of Africa. We know now that possibly the greater part of Africa is one of the healthiest and wealthiest sections in the world. The men of the world are not slow to take advantage of these facts, and to make their investments. And should the business men of the Kingdom be behind them? Alas, they are already; but we believe it will not be for long. We believe that, when the facts are known to them, there will not be wanting Christian men who, as stewards of the Lord's treasures, will be willing to invest their money where it will show results, and fine results, in this world, and ten thousandfold interest in the world to come. MRS. J. M. SPRINGER.

Greatly Pleased

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Mrs. M. A. H. Norris has received the "Anecdotes of Animals," and is greatly pleased with it and so am I. We wonder how you can give such valuable premiums with your paper, which we have had and enjoyed much for many years now. G. W. NORRIS.

What Christmas Brought the Stranger

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE are several different kinds of loneliness in the world; one is the loneliness of the desert, the vast wind-blown sands, the wide sunny sky, the fathomless distances of air and the little caravan faring on, while the traveler pines for home and love on the other side of the globe. There is another loneliness as great, and altogether in contrast. Lost in a crowd as one may be in a great city, where people congregate by thousands and one may walk miles and miles without meeting a familiar face, that loneliness equals the solitude of the desert. A third variety less easily definable may be found in many a little conservative village, fashionable neighborhood or clannish church where no hostility is shown to a newcomer, but where nevertheless people from outside are coldly welcomed and are treated with indifference.

The little inland town of Antrim had long ceased to be glad when new people came to dwell in it. Unlike most places in America it was not pushing and the residents were not interested in real estate, in the development of the locality or in anything that savored especially of money. They were fortunate in having money enough for their wants, and they lived their simple lives in ample houses about which sweet old-fashioned gardens drowsed peacefully all winter under the snow, and bloomed gloriously all summer in a riot of flowers. One mansion had been vacant for a decade, the owner having died abroad leaving no direct heirs. Antrim people heard by and by with a little regret that the Sprague Place had been purchased, and that it would presently be occupied by its new owner. This personage turned out to be a middle-aged lady who arrived on a September morning with two maids and a colored man-servant. The long-closed house was opened and renovated, painters and paper-hangers from the nearest city came and went, the grounds were put in order, and the house very soon lost the air of neglect that had invested it so long.

The minister's wife was entertaining a group of the church ladies one afternoon in early October, and just before the circle broke up suggested that as the minister and herself had called upon Mrs. Whitfield at the Sprague Place, she thought it would be kind if the friends in the congregation would follow their example. "Mrs. Whitfield," she said, "appears to be a quiet, refined woman of wealth and culture. She will be an acquisition to us, and she has already taken a pew and is coming to our church." It may be noted in passing that at Antrim Centre the Methodist Church was the only one, and that Antrimites who went elsewhere had to drive seven or eight miles.

"What did you think of her? I don't mean what did you think about her education, her manners and her clothes, but about herself?" asked Mrs. Fawcett. "We don't care much about strangers in these parts. My husband says that she has not brought any letters of introduction, and he does not believe that she wants to make acquaintances." Mr. Fawcett as a lawyer was supposed to know about the business transactions connected with the sale of the Sprague property.

"Everybody wants to make acquaintances," said the minister's wife with decision. "I thought Mrs. Whitfield very nice, a little quaint and old-fashioned and rather silent, but just nice, and I don't want her to be left out in the cold."

Acting on this hint the good women of Antrim made calls by ones and twos and threes on Mrs. Whitfield, who received them graciously, but who did not seem to have very much ability in conversation. She was shy and reserved, and was somehow wrapped in a veil of sadness, as though something were on her mind that she could not throw off. The minister's wife learned after a while that she had been a widow for twenty years, had lived long in Italy, and that two years before coming to Antrim she had lost her only child.

Mrs. Whitfield returned the calls that were made upon her, and she came regularly to church, but as the autumn weeks sped by it grew evident that she was not to be included, partly through her own fault and partly through the absorption of the Antrim people in their own affairs, in anything that belonged to the real life of the town. She was an outsider, and in her case to be an outsider meant to be very lonely and to pass time in unfriendly solitude. Her maids grew weary of the seclusion of their exile and went back to town. As most of the Antrim women did their own work and there was no church of their order near by, the maids had felt themselves in exile. Mrs. Whitfield sent for others, but failed to find any one who would stay, and on Christmas Eve she sat alone beside her fire, grateful that her faithful manservant—an old retainer of her house—was loyal enough to stay by her and help her in whatever work was to be done.

A storm was brewing and the snow was beginning to fall in thick flakes. The room in which Mrs. Whitfield sat was very bright and cheery with warmth of fire and light of lamp. Books and magazines lay on the table, and old Robert brought in the supper he had prepared. His black face was crowned with wool as white as that of Santa Claus, and as he set the tray on the table he smiled and glanced about the room with pleasure.

"It hab a look of Christmas, honey," said the old servitor in a satisfied tone.

"Yes, indeed," she answered, "thanks to you, Uncle Robert, but why in the world you thought of bringing a Christmas tree and setting it over there between the windows when there's nobody here to enjoy it, I just can't make out. Thank you all the same."

"We never had a Christmas without a Christmas tree," he answered. "You're here, Miss Mary, and lots of memories and the Christ-Child. Yes'm, the Christ-Child, he's here, if we had the eyes to see him."

As he spoke, the bell at the front door rang loudly. Mrs. Whitfield started and looked up in surprise. "Who can it be?" she said. "Nobody ever comes here at night."

"May be a telegram," said old Robert, "or a letter, or folks from across the water. I'll go and open the door."

She listened to his steps on the polished floor of the hall, and presently heard

"'We've lost our way, lady,' said the old man"

The Christmas Guest

AS we approach the Christmas festivities, we are more than ever impressed with the indissoluble connection between the holiday and the event it celebrates. We are told that the celebration is a mere transference of a heathen feast, but if it had been only that, it would not have survived to the present nor would it have retained its peculiar character. It is a season of peace and good-will toward men, which are not characteristics of heathen rites. They are reminiscent rather of the angelic song with which our Lord's advent was greeted. We recognize the season as being commemorative of that greeting which the visitants from the celestial world thought most suitable to characterize the era that he came to introduce. We have not always been true to those features. Christmas has sometimes found Christendom at war and its heart full of enmity, but that note has always been felt to be discordant and alien to the spirit of the Prince of Peace. The Christian, in spite of the tendency to feasting and merriment, has never lost sight of the connection between Christ and Christmas, and still holds it sacred.

It would be well, however, if we brought that connection still closer home to our own hearts and lives. We ought not to place ourselves in the attitude of the innkeeper at Bethlehem, who on that winter night had his house so full that he had no room for the humble couple who in sore stress sought his hospitality. There is danger of this tendency in our day. Jesus is not so often resisted and opposed, as he is crowded out. There is so much to occupy our thoughts and our time that very often there is no room for him. The life that we boastfully call strenuous, is very exacting. We have no time to think of him. We rise in wrath at any attempt to exclude him from our observances, but we do not make room for him in our thoughts and plans. We have not sufficient appreciation of the peace and joy that he would bring with him, to open the door at which he is knocking. Yet those are precisely the blessings we most need. In this hurly-burly, this mad race for wealth and position, in which men are struggling until they become insane and take their own lives, the calm voice saying, "Peace, be still," would bring us the calm we so bitterly need. Let us open the door this year, and even if we have to crowd into corners the avarice and ambition that take so much room, let us receive this divine Guest and give him the chief room, making him the guide and counselor of our lives.

The Age of the Tunnel

SEVERAL years ago people always supposed that two modes of travel would be open to them—either to steam over the surface of the water or the surface of the earth. During the last few years engineers have devoted much time to the development of the tunnel, in order to avoid climbing high inclines and also to avoid passage over rivers, bays and even larger bodies of water. In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there was printed an account of the opening of the remarkable Belmont tunnel between New York City and Long Island City. On Thanksgiving Day a more remarkable "tube through the ground" was opened. It was the new tunnel that runs from the southern extremity of Manhattan Island to Brooklyn. Instead of passing under a river, it in reality goes under the harbor, at one point passing under Governor's Island. The bells of Brooklyn pealed joyfully as the first train passed through.

The new tunnel system of Greater New York will effect such a change in the means of transit to New York, Connecticut and New Jersey as to be little short of revolutionary. The use of the tunnel to facilitate rapid transit has been remarkable. Boston has one under the waters of the harbor to East Boston; Paris is to build several under the river Seine, and American engineers are to do the work, and in England and France they are beginning work to dig a tunnel beneath the turbulent waters of the British channel, a distance of over thirty miles. One proposition has been made that almost takes one's breath away. It is to put a tunnel underneath the channel between the northwestern extremity of North America and the northeastern point of Siberia, in order to have some day through trains from New York to Paris. This last scheme is as yet but an engineering dream; but engineering dreams have been coming true at such a rate in the last few years that people are inclined to believe that this one may be a fact before another half century has passed, and our present day methods of travel to Europe may be as antiquated as the sailing ship is now.

Admiral Sigsbee's Reminiscences

OUR readers are to be congratulated on the pleasure in store for them by the appearance in this issue of the first of a series of remarkable articles contributed by Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee, the gallant hero of the Maine. These contributions cover a period that is marked by some of the most important events in our country's history — a period of great activity by land and sea—and which has witnessed the expansion of our Navy to a proud position among the foremost navies of the world.

In the opening article, the distinguished author deals with the time when he was a midshipman, when our warships were principally sailing craft, and when a seaman's training was totally different from what it is today. He gives us a realistic picture of life under the old conditions, and enriches the recital with bright touches of humor and felicitous description that make the whole story a most enjoyable one. His recollections of the old Naval Academy, with its band of bright young "middies" (many of whom attained fame later in life), its intricate regulations and its pleasant companionships; his first actual seagoing experience as a petty officer; the humors of the "foc'sle," and the odd types of the old-time man-of-war's men, are all recorded in a way that is both fascinating and entertaining. The Admiral is a true sailor, imbued with the romance of sea life, yet keenly alive to all that pertains to the practical side of his profession and a close observer of details.

Further articles from the Admiral's pen, which will appear from time to time in these pages, deal with great historical events, in which not a few of the budding Annapolis cadets bore a conspicuous part. The whole series will constitute a most notable addition to the literature of a period that has been rich in great deeds and heroic men.

Christianity in the Schools

AFTER a week of stormy controversy, which at one time threatened to develop into racial and religious antagonism of a character abhorrent to the spirit of our generous American civilization, the passage-at-arms between Christians and Hebrews in New York over the attempt by the latter to abolish the Christmas celebration in the schools has resulted in a truce. At a meeting of the Board of Education, November 27, the members unanimously recorded their approval of the continuance of the Christmas festival in the public schools in the manner in which it has been celebrated in past years.

This disclaimer by the Board came none too soon. There were indications that the storm of protest, let loose when the attempt to eliminate Christ and Christianity from the schools was first revealed, would quickly become a continental hurricane, if the folly were persisted in. Pastors and laymen of all Christian denominations, Protestant and Catholic, united to prevent the proposed elimination. Arrangements were under way for a great public demonstration and for carrying the people's protest into the highest courts. The national spirit was awakening. The Board of Education, wisely interpreting these signs, officially repealed its former action directed against the Christian holiday and adopted resolutions in which it disclaimed any intention of abolishing the Christmas celebration in the schools. It left the whole matter to the discretion of the principals.

This is a Christian nation, and at this season, when we are again about to commemorate the birth of the Saviour of the world, any feeling of rancor or bitterness that may have been excited by the recent controversy should give place to brotherly love and kindness toward all men, Jew as well as Gentile. Under our flag there is freedom and room enough for all races and creeds to worship God in their own way, without intolerance or molestation. Let us strive to keep this freedom inviolate, and to preserve for ourselves the same rights and liberties we have so generously granted to others.

Will You Help?

THE golden opportunity of Christmas is at hand. The particular season of the year when it seems easier to do good than at any other is upon us. Our hearts are tender and sensitive within us. Our ears are keenly acute to the cries of need around us. We see, with clearer vision, hands that are lifted in direst misery, and in yearning appeal. We feel we must be loving and helpful, or Christmas will be a mockery to us.

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers cannot, and will not, we are sure, at such a time, forget the thousands of homeless men who will be the special care of the BOWERY MISSION. The work of this old soul-saving institution is prosecuted with unabated zeal the whole year round; but it is at Christmas time that the task of providing for the material wants of men becomes so overwhelming. WILL YOU HELP?

FATHERS AND MOTHERS! Young prodigals will come to the Mission this Christmas by the hundred. It will be a HOME to them. They will enjoy the brightness of its meetings, the fare upon its tables, the warm welcome of its loving workers. It may be YOUR BOY. If not, some other gray-haired father or broken-hearted mother will miss him from their own Christmas family circle. WILL YOU NOT HELP SAVE SOMEBODY'S BOY?

BUSINESS MEN! GOD has prospered you. There is not an earthly comfort you do not enjoy. A happy home, unnumbered blessings, countless friends—this is your lot. Will you remember that here in the city there are hundreds of old men, just the same age, probably, as your own honored father, who are UTTERLY FRIENDLESS? They, like younger men, walk the streets every night, ill-clad and shivering.

Here in the BOWERY MISSION, at CHRISTMASTIDE of 1907, there is presented to you such an opportunity of feeding the hungry, giving water to the thirsty, ministering to the sick and needy brethren, as has rarely been known in the history of the Christian Church. WILL YOU HELP?

Young men, tired of a sinful course and eager to get the first foothold in a better life; old men, nearing the end of life's journey in awful and appalling need; sick men, for whom there is no room in the city hospitals; workless men, friendless men, poorly-clad men, will on Christmas day be welcomed and fed within the hospitable doors of the Mission. A Christmas dinner will be given them. Seven thousand breakfasts will be served during the week and shelter and clothing will be provided for the most needy. WILL YOU HELP?

If so, kindly send your contribution to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY, and it will be duly and gratefully acknowledged.

Immigrants and Emigrants

THIS has been a record year in the history of immigration. Never before have the incoming steamers brought so many thousands of settlers. October was a record month, which taxed the force of the bureau. A singular feature of the traffic, however, is that there has been during November an unprecedented rush of passengers eastward. In one week alone, over sixty thousand persons sailed from New York for European ports. The demand for transportation was so enormous that the railroads had to run special trains to bring people to New York to take passage to Europe. The outgoing steamers were all crowded in the steerage and many of them found plenty of applicants for second-cabin accommodation. Large numbers were left behind, for whom no room could be found, and these waited for the steamers of the following week, while the railroads were bringing in more crowds to add to their number. In no previous year have there been such numbers returning. In one day upwards of twelve thousand sailed away. Various causes are assigned for the unusual outflow. In some instances the men are carrying away the little fortunes they have acquired and which they hope to spend in their native lands. In others the shutting down of factories, owing to the financial disturbance, has left the workmen stranded and they go back to the home land, hoping for better conditions. In other cases the discharged men think that as they may be unemployed for some weeks, this is a good time to pay their relatives at home a visit and they will probably return. These are the causes, combined with the low steerage rates, assigned for the unprecedented movement. It depends on what a man comes here for, whether he remains. Some are attracted by the prospect of large gains and others by the freedom enjoyed here and the grandeur of our institutions. The former go back when they have attained their object, the latter become citizens. Men who come here only for what they can get for themselves can be well spared. They are no loss to the nation. There will always be such men among our immigrants, but it is not of such that our best citizens are made. They go from us because they are not of us. In the visible kingdom of Christ on earth there are the same causes operating. Those are apt to return to the world who sought only gain to themselves, but they stay who sought peace and holiness.

And truly if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out they might have had opportuniy to have returned. (Hebrews 11 : 15).

Dead at His Post

A remarkable railroad accident occurred recently on the New York Subway. The road passes on to an elevated structure at Boston Road, and it was there the accident happened. A train passed the station without diminishing speed and crashed into a train ahead. Happily the conductor on the forward train had seen it coming and had rushed the few passengers in the rear car into those ahead. They were thus saved from death when the rear train struck the car, cutting its way almost the whole length of it. The shock, however, was so great that the passengers in the forward cars were severely shaken and some sustained cuts from broken glass. The body of the motorman of the rear train was so badly mangled that the surgeons could not discover its condition; but at the inquest it was stated that he was an exceptionally careful and reliable man. The theory of the company is that he was stricken with apoplexy before the accident occurred and had been unable to turn off the power on reaching the station. The train consequently had proceeded with the dead motorman in charge. It is marvelous that no greater mischief was done. An effort is now being made to induce the companies to put an extra motorman on the trains, so as to avoid danger of a worse catastrophe from such a cause. Death may deprive the motorman at any moment of the power to arrest the force he has set in motion, and there should be some one at hand to avert disaster. It may be done in the case of the motorman, but we too often forget that there are forces which we start in our lives that may go on working good or evil after we are dead.

Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours and their works do follow them. (Rev. 14 : 13).

Pay for Court Presentation

The offer of a man in Pittsburg, Pa., to obtain the privilege of presentation to King Edward of England for a pecuniary consideration, has been eagerly accepted by wealthy citizens. The police arrived at the conlusion that the offer was a trick to obtain money and arrested the man. In his rooms, when they were searched, over two hundred letters were found from persons wishing to avail themselves of his services. One letter was from a lady who expressed her desire to obtain other advantages. She said she has a daughter for whom she wants to obtain a husband with a title. She was not particular about the character or standing of the husband, providing he had a place in the peerage. If such a marriage could be arranged, she would be willing to pay the person who procured the marriage, ten thousand dollars, on the day the ceremony took place. Most of the replies, however, appeared to come from persons who would be satisfied with a court presentation. It is marvelous that any one should take such pains and pay money to obtain a presentation to an earthly monarch, when there is so much indifference to the offer freely made of intimate relations with the King of kings.

If a man love me he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him. (John 14 : 23).

Telephone from the Chest

A discovery recently made in St. Louis, Mo., may cause a revolution in the use of the telephone. A person in that city telephoning to a friend, made a remark while holding the instrument to her chest instead of putting her lips to the transmitter. To her surprise a reply came through the receiver that she was holding to her ear, showing that her friend had heard the remark. She continued speaking with the transmitter at her chest and found that her words were heard quite as distinctly as when she spoke into the transmitter. The [illegible] who expressed his surprise, but said, "[illegible] a sensitive instrument the telephone is. [illegible] conditions, in an air chamber, a disparagin[illegible] with the vibrations of the voice. [illegible] phragm modulates an electric current flowing through the circuit, which modulations are heard at the other end. The transmitter is sensitive enough to receive vibrations coming through the chest or through any part of the body where vibrations may be felt. No one can tell what changes in the instrument may result from the discovery, but at least it will prevent a loud tone and ignorance of the danger, so often pointed out, of a [illegible] person inhaling microbes, if he uses the telephone after it has been used by a consumptive or a [illegible] sufferer. Sanitarians have often declared that the instrument is capable of transmitting diseases as well as sounds. If this method of using the instrument comes into general use, there will be no need of sterilizing the mouthpiece, which the doctors insist should be done as a precaution against contagion. There will, however, be the same need as there has always been to be vigilant over the heart, so that our communications may never be [illegible] means to ourselves or to those with whom we talk. Distance makes no difference to our responsibility. A conversation over the telephone may do as much good or as much mischief to the person at either end as might be done if the two were in one another's presence. A lie or a slander is not purified or sterilized by passing over the wire.

To Europe by Auto

A proposal has been made by a Paris journal to arrange a trip by automobile from New York to Paris. The idea is to proceed across the continent to Alaska, through Alaska and across Bering Straits to Siberia, through Siberia and Russia, and thus to Paris. The Arctic portion of the trip would have to be carried out in midwinter, when the straits are frozen and when the frozen rivers of the North might be expected to furnish the best highways. With this end in view it is proposed to have the journey begun in the middle of February, 1908. The difficulties of the tour are fully recognized. For example, in one part of Siberia six hundred miles would have to be traversed without opportunity for replenishing the fuel supply. And before Siberia is reached there is the difficulty of Bering Straits to be solved. The Straits do not always freeze in such a way as to afford a safe crossing for a heavy machine laden with the men and the supplies it will be necessary for them to carry for so long a journey. It is estimated that the route would cover fifteen thousand miles. A preliminary experiment proves that the scheme is quite feasible, but all depends on the conditions of the ice and the roads. It is pointed out that it will not be a case of driving ahead, but of intelligent adaptation to the prevailing conditions, so that arrangement of food supply and fuel for the cars, and the ability to meet and triumph over difficulties [illegible] have never before been encountered. It will indeed be an adventurous journey. An accident to the machinery, or a failure of fuel in the wilds of Alaska or Siberia, would probably lead to the death of the travelers by starvation or fatigue. He [illegible] and he will be the [illegible] He courts the dangers and [illegible] ager in the journey of [illegible] duty, and he will not have the support that comes to [illegible] who goes forward [illegible]

CENTENARY OF WHITTIER'S BIRTH

Photographs by permission of Mr. Pickard

The Poet's Birthplace Near Haverhill, Mass.

The "Garden Room" in his Amesbury Home

House in which Whittier Died, Hampton Falls, N. H

SO near to us by the living memories of his tuneful songs is the beloved Quaker poet John Greenleaf Whittier that it is difficult to realize that one hundred years have passed since he was born. He was so seldom seen among us during the latter years of his invalidism that he came to us like a voice, and only by the silence that has fallen, do we perceive that he is no longer with us in the flesh. It is somewhat startling, therefore, to learn that the centenary of his birth occurs this month. It is right that it should be celebrated, for we owe him much, and during his life he did not know how sincerely he was honored and loved. His little circle of friends were warm in their appreciation, but the masses of the people were content to accept his tuneful words without spoken gratitude. Yet he valued such tokens as did come, and declared they were worth having. Future generations may be proud of him and place his name, as Horace Greeley did, above all the poets his country has produced, but to us he is like a neighbor, whose shrewd and kindly utterances linger in our memories like familiar music. We are too near to him, not only in time but in the friendly association of his genial words, to form a just estimate of his eminence.

Not his the song whose thundrous chime
Eternal echoes render,
The mournful Tuscan's haunted rhyme
And Milton's starry splendor.

But who his human heart has laid
To Nature's bosom nearer?
Who sweetened toil like him, or paid
To love a tribute dearer?

Yet Whittier was a true poet whose genius was distinguished by its purity, who was without a living equal as an interpreter of nature, and whose whole life was an effort to inspire men with the lofty sentiments of patriotism and Christian brotherhood.

He was born at Haverhill, Mass., on Dec: 17, 1807, in the old farmhouse built by his ancestor, Thomas Whittier, who had come from England to Boston in 1638. The earlier years of Whittier's life were uneventful. His school training was confined to narrow limits, and his opportunities for mental culture were few; but he made the most of them. At a time when most boys are enjoying the sports of childhood, he was busy working on a farm. Every "First-day" his father and mother would take the children to the Friends' meeting house in Amesbury, eight miles from the Whittier farm. Around that lovely pastoral country young Whittier roamed, his artistic spirit expanding by contact with nature.

His occupations were like those of other boys of his class at the time. He drove the cattle to and from pasture, carried in wood for the fire and helped in the harvests. In the winter when there was less to do on the farm, he went to school and eagerly perused all the books he could borrow. One of the farm hands taught him shoemaking, and he earned enough by that means to carry him through the academy one winter. The following winter he was able to teach, and gained enough money to take a second term in the academy. Even at that early age his genius manifested itself in verses that the editor of the local journal thought good enough to print. One or two short poems that seemed better than others, Whittier sent to William Lloyd Garrison, who was then editing the Free Press. Garrison thought so well of them that he sought out his young contributor, and a friendship was begun which had a strong influence on Whittier's character.

Garrison would have had him enter journalism immediately, but Whittier's father dying, the young man regarded his first duty as that of the home, and for five years he carried on the farm. But his own inclinations and the urgency of Garrison could not be denied, and in 1830 he undertook to edit the Haverhill Gazette. His failing health, however, rendered that engagement a short one. At the end of two years he was back again on the farm. His strong sympathy with the Abolition movement, personally and as a Quaker, drew him back into journalism, and in 1836 he went to Philadelphia to edit the Pennsylvania Freeman. But public feeling was beginning to run high, and after a little more than a year a riotous mob surrounded the office of the paper and burned it to the ground. Whittier then settled at Amesbury, near his birthplace.

There he produced his first book, entitled New England Legends in Prose and Verse. These alone, independent of later and more finished productions, would have stamped him as one of the leading poets of his generation. Thoughtful men and women who appreciated genius, began to look toward the rural homestead at Amesbury, Mass., for still better things, and they were not disappointed, for lyrics that stirred to patriotism, poems that awoke the purest and tenderest emotions of which the human heart is capable, and songs of faith and hope flowed from his pen. During the following years he remained quietly in his New England home, leaving it rarely and only for brief periods. But he kept in touch with the stirring events of the time and took his own view of the gigantic struggle of the fratricidal conflict. His little household consisted at first of his beloved mother and sister, and afterward, when bereft of one and then the other, their place was filled by his niece. There had been a time, as we learn since his death, when the hope of marriage had filled his mind. During a stay in Hartford, Conn., he became acquainted with the daughter of his friend, Judge Russ, and in a beautiful letter to her, still in existence, he asked her to become his wife. What her answer was Whittier never told, and Cornelia Russ kept the secret. Only in his poem, entitled, "Memories," we catch a hint of the pain her refusal caused him:

How thrills once more the lengthening chain
Of memory at the thought of thee!
Old hopes which long in dust have lain,
Old dreams come thronging back again,
And boyhood lives again in me.

He had little income besides what came from the poems and contributions to the press. But that sufficed for his modest wants, and as his intimate friend, Annie Fields, the daughter of his publisher, tells us, it left him a margin, on which he drew liberally for any person who presented a touching claim. There were times during those years when his recurring headaches prevented him writing for more than half an hour at a time; but his pen could not be at rest, and in the calm retirement of his country home his mind was dwelling continually on the truths he embodied in the inscription on a sun-dial: "I know there is light above me, by the shade below." His peaceful nature clung to the quietness in which he could hear the heavenly voices speaking to him. His deep content is expressed in the familiar lines which he called his "Psalm":

No longer forward nor behind
I look in hope or fear;
But, grateful, take the good I find,
The best of now and here.

I plough no more a desert land,
To harvest weed and tare;
The manna dropping from God's hand
Rebukes my painful care.

I break my pilgrim staff—I lay
Aside the toiling oar;
The angel sought so far away
I welcome at my door.

And all the jarring notes of life
Seem blending in a psalm,
And all the angles of its strife
Slow rounding into calm.

He was firm to the end in his fidelity to the Society of Friends and loved to sit in the meetings, often absolutely silent, in which God's presence was felt in solemn consciousness. Yet the ancient creeds could not bind his free spirit, and his mind, as he shows in his poem, the "Reformer," was ever open to new interpretations:

For life shall on and upward go;
Th' eternal step of progress beats
To that great anthem, calm and slow,
Which God repeats.

God works in all things; all obey
His first propulsion from the night:
Wake thou and watch! the world is gray
With moving light!

To him the good man was he who labored most to serve his fellows, and he could recognize a kindred spirit in one whose creed was widely diverse from his own.

No bars of sect or clime were felt,
The Babel strife of tongues had ceased,
And at one common altar knelt
The Quaker and the priest.

He had an abiding conviction of the goodness and wisdom of God, which made even his prayers communion rather than petition, and kept him calm in every dispensation of sorrow and bereavement. His words to the burdened soul perplexed by prayers unanswered, have been a comfort to many a mourner:

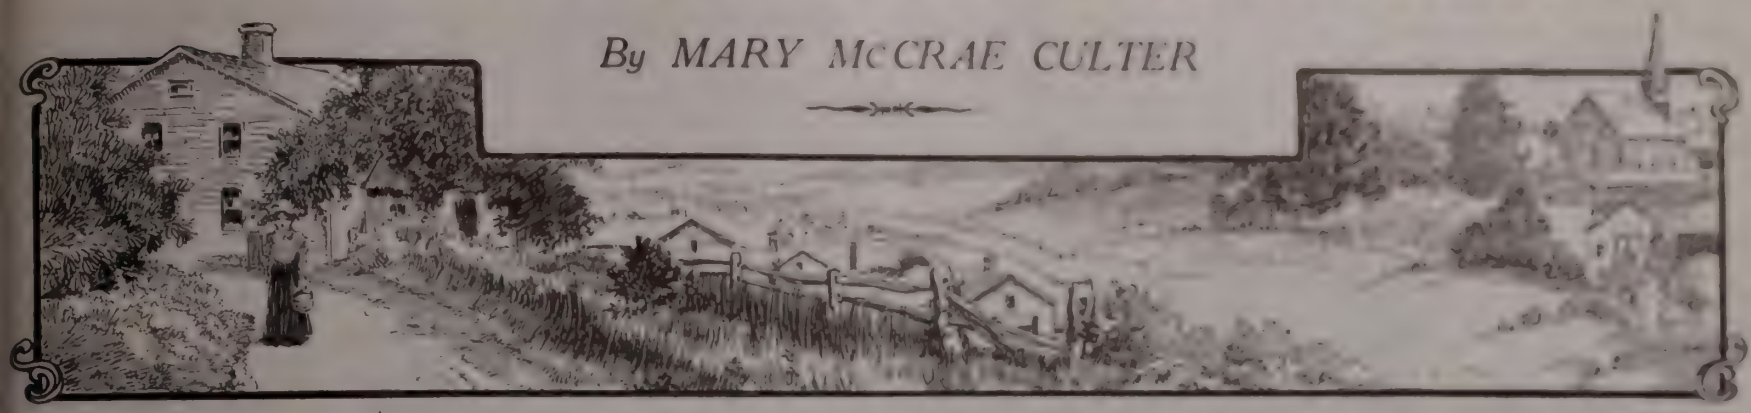
The dear God hears and pities all;
He knoweth all our wants;
And what we blindly ask of him,
His love withholds or grants.

And so I sometimes think our prayers
Might well be merged in one;
And nest and perch and hearth and church
Repeat, "Thy will be done!"

The end was like the life, beautifully quiet. He had been persuaded to go on a visit to a friend at Hampton Falls, N.H., and while there the summons came. His niece and many dear friends hurried to his bedside. They had still hope and noted any improvements that occurred, but with a surer prescience he recognized the messenger whose face he did not dread. With a full appreciation that death was near, he roused himself to give one last message to all who knew him. In a weak, broken voice he said, "Love only—love—to the—world."

THE MISCHIEF-MAKERS

By MARY McCRAE CULTER



CHAPTER I

The Appointment

"IT is only right that I should warn you that if you take this church you will find the place a hard one."

The speaker was the Rev. Homer Grant, D.D., speaking to Rev. Edgar Allan, to whom he had offered the pastorate of the church at Hawthorne, Kan. Dr. Grant proceeded to give some reasons for his discouraging prediction.

"Several of our most efficient and godly men—men with much experience—have found themselves unable to make any material advances in Hawthorne. Their most earnest efforts came to nought, or else, when carried to a successful issue, proved but transient and vanished in a most discouraging manner. A minister rarely remains in charge of that church for more than two years, while the majority are ready to accept almost any other field after one year's trial of the place."

Dr. Grant was the head of the Home Mission Board, and he went on to state the experience of the Board with the church. For a time, the Home Mission Committee laid the blame for these unsatisfactory conditions upon the ministers whom they had sent there: for when we visited the people we found them deeply interested in all that concerns the church—active, wide-awake, and, in general, a well-educated body of men and women. But of late years we have laid the continuous troubles at their door, since so many of our ministers, whom we know to be able men, have come away with the same story of discouragement and of inability to carry on the work.

"It is only fair to yourself to tell you that something is vitally wrong with Hawthorne. It is better that you should know it before undertaking the care of the church there. Perhaps, too, if you are forewarned you will not only be forearmed for the conditions, but will also be able to discover the root of the trouble and so solve the puzzle which has thus far proved too much for the Home Mission Committee. Are you willing to undertake the task?"

Dr. Grant looked anxiously at the young man, for he really wished him to accept the pastorate, but not under any delusion. The horse-dealer does not always feel bound to tell a prospective purchaser that the steed has a bad temper, but leaves him to find it out by experience. But an official of a church is under higher obligation, and Dr. Grant had therefore felt it a conscientious duty to speak as he had done. The man to succeed at Hawthorne must be a man who had tact and sound judgment as well as piety and consecration. This young man looked shrewd and firm, and therefore eminently suited for the pastorate of such a church. The report he had received from Yale and Princeton, where Mr. Allan had studied, showed that he had been an earnest student and a zealous worker; but had he the capacity for administration? Looking him over critically, Dr. Grant, a good judge of men, thought so. Still he would not urge it. The young man should decide for himself.

Mr. Allan sat meditatively tracing the pattern of the carpet in Dr. Grant's study, considering the question of this frank offer. It was not the church he would have chosen. Some city church to which workingmen resorted, to whom he could have spoken the words of which his heart was full; a church among the poor, giving him opportunity for self-denying labor, would have been more to his mind. But who was he, said the young man to himself, that he should choose his lot? He had consecrated himself to Christ years ago, for labor or for sacrifice; and should he now refuse a post which was admitted to be one of difficulty? Something stirred his blood to attempt a task in which others had failed. He was young enough to feel the glamour of heroism. Yes, he would go, he was alone in the world, no one besides himself would suffer if he failed, and he believed that with a single-hearted resolve to do his duty he would not fail. Silently he lifted his heart to God in a prayer for help, and in reliance on that help he made his resolve.

"A merry voice called from the doorway"

Looking up suddenly he caught Dr. Grant's examining glance, and with a quiet conviction that his senior had been studying him sympathetically, he smiled a recognition of it. "I cannot blame you, sir," he said, "if I have a trying experience. You have been frank with me. I know from what you have said that Hawthorne will be no bed of roses; but it seems to me a matter of duty. The Lord's soldiers are not to choose their posts, and I think he has assigned this to me. He did not shrink from the thorny path himself, and I will take up the cross and follow him. God helping me I will do my duty as he shows it to me."

Dr. Grant held out his hand in admiration and said, "You will do. That is the right spirit. I believe I may congratulate the Mission Board and the church at Hawthorne, and I hope I may live to congratulate you." Putting his hand on the young man's shoulder in benediction, he continued, "May he who ordained Joshua go with you and say to you, 'I will not fail thee nor forsake thee, for unto this people shalt thou divide the land for an inheritance. Only be thou strong and very courageous.' You had better study that charge to the leader of a peculiar people whom he had to guide and govern, for you have difficulties before you similar to his. May you have his wisdom and his success. Now let us have a few words of prayer together."

The old man and the young one knelt down and offered together an earnest prayer that he who gives wisdom to those who ask it, and upbraids not, might be with his young servant in all his ways.

CHAPTER II

The New Scene

THE town of Hawthorne was situated in the heart of one of the best farming regions of the State of Kansas. While it was a small town of only a few hundred inhabitants, it was surrounded by a thickly settled community, and was supported by rich and intelligent farmers and stock-raisers, upon whose patronage it existed. Four churches raised their spires toward heaven, "proclaiming either that Hawthorne was a very pious town for its size, or else that extra efforts were necessary for its redemption," as one of its inhabitants had remarked. Situated upon a hill above a large river, it commanded a view on the one hand of rolling uplands covered with fertile wheat-fields, and on the other of a wide-spread prospect of the rich corn-producing lands of the valley.

"Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, the city of the great king," murmured the Rev. Edgar Allan as he stood upon the porch of his boarding-house and looked upon his prospect, the morning after his arrival in Hawthorne. "Would that God would make that true of his Mount Zion in this place! The joy of the whole earth! Heathenism should be the joy of this portion of the earth, and where it is a very jet upon a hill, which cannot be hid, it should be a beacon light for all within sight of it."

His meditations were interrupted by his host, who stepped out to join him.

"Admiring our beautiful view, are you? Well, we are all proud of it. Many of our closest members live away yonder in the valley, as you will find later on. We will drive over there this afternoon, if you like. I want to see Mr Alison on business, any way, and it will be a good opportunity for you to make his acquaintance. He is quite wealthy, gives liberally to our church, and is always present at church and Sunday School, an ideal man, but a little peculiar, you will find. We have a deal of trouble to make things run smoothly sometimes, for he is quite opinionated and inflexible. You have met that kind of person, I presume."

"Yes, Mr Heyward. That seems to be a prevailing American type, both of men and women, but I cannot say that I deem it bad, so long as 'opinions' are right, and the 'inflexibility' is not carried to obstinacy," answered the young minister.

"Yes, yes. Quite right," responded Mr Heyward heartily. "I hope you will find our friend Alison to your liking. Over there, where you see that grove and the tall white woodwork, is the home of James Lawrence, another of our wealthy members. He is the very opposite of our friend Alison, a quiet, meek man, who is content to allow his wife and daughters to supersede his opinions, which I assure you they are quite capable of doing. They take a very active part in church affairs, and are seldom absent. At present, the elder daughter is away from home, attending school. It has long been a question in my mind, whether it was right for the daughters of wealthy men to be allowed to fill positions which are absolutely needed by girls who are dependent upon their own exertions for a living. The daughter Hattie wished to do something of the kind, but I positively forbade it. There is no need for her to earn her living, and for her to take a position such as she desired, would be to keep some poor girl from securing a good situation. So I kept Hattie here, to assist her mother and to brighten our home with things which she does very well."

"And you were right," assented Mr Allan. "It is your public-spirited people who desire to thus and [illegible] the coming [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

ECHOES OF THE W. C. T. U. CONVENTION

By MARTHA M. ALLEN

THE president of Geogia W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary Harris Armour, and the president of Oklahoma, Mrs. Abbie Hillerman, were the celebrities of the recent National W. C. T. U. Convention at Nashville, Tenn., because of the prohibition victories achieved in their States during the past year.

Mrs. Armour is a remarkable woman. No W. C. T. U. speaker since Frances E. Willard has had such power to stir audiences as Mrs. Armour has, yet she is very different from Miss Willard. The Nashville papers likened her to Sam Jones. Her address upon "How Georgia Went Dry" was so enthusiastically received that she was asked to remain in Nashville after the close of the Convention, and to repeat the address to an audience of men only.

She said that the passage of a prohibitory law in Georgia was a modern miracle, that the day of miracles is not past, but the day of great faith is past. But works went with the faith, for nothing that could be done to bring success was left undone. Temperance literature flooded the State, ministers were urged to take the lead in their communities, mass meetings were held all over the State with the best speakers obtainable, the temperance and church forces were unified, with the result that a great flame of prohibition sentiment was kindled, so that nine license counties went dry in one year.

Then the temperance forces demanded State prohibition. To aid in this, the Georgian, an Atlanta daily paper, came out squarely against the saloons. The editor was threatened and abused by the liquor-sellers, but he said his mother was a White-Ribboner, and he was working for her.

Mrs. Armour made it clear that the press reports of her ejection from the gallery of the House while the bill was under discussion were utterly false. All through the campaign, she said, they cried to God for guidance, and it was he who gave the victory.

Sheriff Johns, of Nashville, who was one of the speakers at the late Convention, showed that he is of the new type of politicians, the type not afraid of the word "prohibition." He said he believed that Tennessee would be entirely free from the liquor traffic within two years, and added: "It is the one public aspiration of my life to put Nashville absolutely dry. When that is done, I am willing to retire to private life.

The Convention sermon on Sunday afternoon by Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, superintendent of evangelistic work, was upon the topic, "Christ's Indignation." She said: "A twentieth century revival is needed, not only of love and tenderness, but of Christlike indignation at sin, wrong and oppression. . . . Let the women of America arise, unite, and resolve in a great passion of righteousness and Christlike indignation to save the oppressed of the nation, and it will be done."

Mrs. Smith Davis represented the National W. C. T. U. at the Anti-Alcohol Congress, held in Stockholm, Sweden, last July, and her address before the Convention was upon "Temperance Work Abroad." She reported over 700,000 essays upon the effects of alcohol and tobacco, written by school children the past year in response to prizes offered. A prize of fifty dollars was given to a young girl in the State of Washington for the best essay of the year. Dr. McCormack made a statement which should be chronicled. It was that he believes the time has come when alcohol should be laid aside as a remedy in the treatment of disease. He said whisky had killed thousands where it had helped one. The Department of Medical Temperance of the W. C. T. U. has for years been sending out in leaflet and pamphlet form the teachings of distinguished physicians of England, Germany and America, who have laid aside alcoholic liquors as remedies because they have found them to be not only unnecessary but frequently prejudicial to recovery. This department also originated the public agitation against fraud in patent medicines, and has done incalculable good in showing the temperance forces that the liquor traffic can no longer hide itself behind the excuse, "useful as medicine." Georgia has learned this lesson so well that its law forbids whisky prescribing by physicians.

Ten thousand new members were added to the white-ribbon hosts the past year, Ohio alone gaining 8,000. All the officers were re-elected except the "Y" secretary, Mrs. Sebery, who could serve no longer. The Convention next year will meet in Denver.

more lasting qualities than have hot coffee and muffins, while the conversation can go with them as well as with the prospect."

"And a pretty girl's presence goes well with either of them," added Mr. Hayward jocularly, pinching his daughter's rosy cheek as he led the way into the house.

Rev. Edgar Allan mentally agreed with this opinion although he made no verbal assent thereto, and found himself secretly rejoicing in the wisdom of his host in keeping this very attractive girl "to brighten the home" of which he was so fortunate as to be an inmate for the year to come. The first view of Hawthorne was certainly encouraging. The young minister was favorably impressed. It would be a delight to live in a scene of such natural beauty; and if the Hayward family was a specimen of the church families, he could not wish for a more cordial and friendly people.

CHAPTER III

Maiden Confidences

"HOW do you like him? What does he look like? Anything like what you imagined he would be?" Dora Murray questioned eagerly of her friend, Hollis Hayward, who had run across town to give her the news of the arrival in Hawthorne of the Rev. Edgar Allan.

"Like him? He's just adorable. I'm going to fall dead in love with him. No, he does not look the least little bit like I imagined him. He is a little above the average height, and well built in proportion. He has dark hair, and glorious dark eyes, and is quite the handsomest young man who has ever entered Hawthorne. He has agreed to board at our house. I told mamma she just had to keep him—and now if things don't go my way in Hawthorne church, my name isn't Hollis Hayward. That's all."

"Maybe it won't be Hollis Hayward long," suggested Dora. "Unless this Mr. Allan is very different from the majority of the young men who come to Hawthorne, he'll be wanting to change it for you—and he will need a second preacher to help him do it, too."

"Hush! hush! you naughty girl. Just as if I were the only girl in Hawthorne. Perhaps Mr. Allan's taste does not turn to red-haired girls," cried Miss Hayward, not at all displeased by her friend's suggestive flattery.

"Red-haired! Your hair is the loveliest dark auburn that ever poet raved over, and it is the envy of half the girls about Hawthorne," Dora added with a sly look. "If you decide to fall in love with the preacher you will have no use for Charlie Lester, and you might bequeath him to me."

"All right. Just so you don't let Mabel Lawrence get him. That would be an unmitigated calamity, after all my efforts to keep them apart.

"But come," continued Hollis, "we've no time for joking. This is Saturday, and we must get our plans all laid for the church reception for Mr. Allan, so that we can make arrangements for it to-morrow when everybody is in town. We got very little done last week, thanks to Mabel Lawrence's interference, beyond deciding upon having a reception, and setting the date for Thursday evening. She insisted on Tuesday evening, because Thursday is the evening for prayer-meeting, and took up so much time that we could get nothing else done."

"Just as if prayer-meeting couldn't be set aside for once," said Dora. "Nobody attends it any way, except a few grandpas and grandmas and Tilly Walker, who goes for the sake of the opportunity to worry the organ and warble the hymns to those old people."

Both girls laughed over Dora's uncharitable remark, then Hollis said:

"Mabel was only 'playing good' when she made that objection. She wanted to make a record for herself to which she might refer if the new minister objected to omitting the prayer-meeting for that evening. There's nothing like good 'first impressions,' you know."

"And you have made yours?"

"That is to be seen later," replied Hollis with a little conscious flush that was not unobserved by her friend.

"What refreshments shall we have?" asked Dora.

"I had thought of strawberries and cream, cake and chocolate. But Mabel will object on the ground of berries being so expensive at this time of year, and will insist on salads and sandwiches and coffee, for mere contrariness and to save a dollar or two."

"It's ridiculous how stingy those Lawrences are. But I'll stand by you, Hollis, and you can count on Charlie Lester's support, too."

"I'm not so sure about that," said Hollis. "I could, if my opponent were any one but Mabel Lawrence. The better way would be not to let the men have any part in the matter."

"Beyond paying the bills," said Dora.

Hollis nodded and continued: "We'll call the girls together after Sunday School, and a few of the older women, like your mother and mine, and fix the thing up promptly to suit ourselves. Then we will have it announced in church."

"What will we have in the way of entertainment?" asked Dora.

"I'm sure I do not know. I will have to wait until I can find out what Mr. Allan thinks about such things. We can decide between now and Thursday."

"We never consulted the preachers before," said Dora; "then why should we now? What do we care for their opinions on such things? Why should we consult Mr. Allan more than any of the rest?"

"Oh, but he is different"—Hollis began, but Dora interrupted her with a merry laugh.

"That is true," she said as soon as she could command her voice. "He is young, and handsome, and unmarried—and the rest of them were not. That does make a difference—especially with some people."

Hollis flushed angrily. "If you are going to be horrid about it, we will throw the whole thing over."

"And let Mabel Lawrence take it up and run it?"

"Never. I'm glad Kathleen is away, for we couldn't do a thing to suit ourselves. She and Mabel together would be too strong a force to combat. All the old people are silly over Kathleen. I never could see anything so superior about Kathleen Lawrence."

STORY OF A MISSIONARY SUBSTITUTE

FROM Mrs. J. Woodberry, missionary in Shanghai, China, whose work in the Orient is known to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers through her occasional letters in these pages, we have received an interesting and instructive history of a missionary substitute's work in another part of the ancient East. Some years ago the Shanghai Mission, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Woodberry, decided to put a "substitute" in the field at Jerusalem. A movement with this object in view was organized, and Muallin Malchi Hannoosh, a Christian native of Mesopotamia, was engaged to conduct the work.

"When we personally visited Jerusalem," writes Mrs. Woodberry, we saw with our own eyes the work that is now so dear to our hearts. Malchi's own account of his life and work is given below:

"'I was born of Christian parents in 1865, in a village called Karabash, four miles east of Diarbekir, Mesopotamia. My father was pastor of a church in Mardin. I was dedicated to the Lord in infancy as Samuel was. My dear mother greatly rejoiced that I was inclined to religious things from a child. She told me, "My son, I have vowed you to the Lord and his service." When I was fifteen years old I was sent to the Mardin High School of the American Mission, and after three years became schoolmaster at Karabash. Next year I was promoted to teach in a higher school at Sert, 120 miles east of Diarbekir. The scholars increased from twelve to seventy, and I preached as well as taught, for the Protestant congregation were without a pastor. I began to call on the people in their houses. I worked here for ten years, and saw the good results of my toil. Then the gloomy days of the Armenian massacres came. In these massacres I lost my dear father, as well as fifty of my relatives. We who were spared were left in a miserable condition, suffering from hunger, cold and nakedness. Our lives being in danger, we were compelled to leave Sert for Mosul (the old Nineveh). Here I was treated kindly by the brethren, and again taught school. But God was calling me to Jerusalem to serve him, and I started on a long and toilsome journey, arriving in Jerusalem after four weeks' travel.

Malchi Hannoosh, the Mesopotamian Evangelist, and Family

"'There a group of missionaries welcomed me, and after inquiring about my work and purpose in coming to the Holy City, asked me to stay with them. They told me that for a long time they had been praying for an evangelist to work among the Jews, Mohammedans and nominal Christians, and that their evangelist would be supported by Mr. and Mrs. Woodberry's students and friends in China. Being convinced that it was God's will and call, I accepted it with joy. Jerusalem is the religious centre of the Jewish, Christian and Mohammedan religions. I think there is no other city that needs preachers and evangelization so much. Thousands of pilgrims and tourists from all parts of the world come to visit the sacred places. There are murderers among the pilgrims, who visit the sacred places to get remission for their sins. The majority are quite ignorant of the way of salvation. Thousands of Jews come annually from remote countries to dwell in their fathers' city and weep because their sacred shrines are in the hands of the heathen. They fervently pray, with tears, for the coming of the Messiah, who they believe will restore to them the temple and the beloved city and will restore the kingdom of Israel. Many poor old Jews come here to die and be buried in the sacred soil. I went daily to the Jewish quarters and shops and spoke with them about the Messiah. I gave them Hebrew religious tracts and portions of Gospels. It was easy to have long conversations with many of them about salvation through Jesus Christ, and I am delighted to say we have seen fruits from our labors among them.

" 'Moslems, too, come here from afar—from India, Persia and Africa, on pilgrimages to the Holy Rock, because Jerusalem, next to Mecca, is their heart's desire. Their pilgrimage is not completed till they have visited and bowed in prayer beneath the dome of the rock, from which they believe their prophet Mohammed ascended to heaven, and therefore those who visit the rock receive great reward and have their sins pardoned. I met a gray-headed Indian Mohammedan pilgrim, who had come to Jerusalem to get remission of sins. I explained to him the way of salvation by the blood of Jesus Christ, and he heard me gladly. When I asked if he had read the Holy Bible, he ex-

[illegible] pressed a desire to do so, and half and more also to find an Arabic Gospel in Indian. I promised that I would and he promised to read them as to the [illegible] on the morrow.

"'Thousands of nominal Christians come as pilgrims annually from Russia, Greece, Abyssinia, and the different countries of Europe. They come to visit the sacred places where the Saviour was born, lived, suffered, died, was buried and rose again. Many of these pilgrims [illegible] have had and keep night vigils, repeating many prayers, and also torment themselves in suffering great hardship to get peace. On a hot summer day as I was returning home from Bethlehem, I met a Christian pilgrim with a burden on his back, walking barefooted and bareheaded. He said he had walked about one thousand miles from his native land to Jerusalem, with the object of visiting the holy sepulchre and the Saviour's [illegible] place, in order to get pardon for his sins. I spoke to him about God's love, and what Christ had done to save him from his sin. I told him to put on his feet and shoes, but he answered that it was impossible and went on with his burden.

"'A Syrian Lutheran monk of Mesopotamia has walked to Jerusalem six times. He has walked barefooted all the way each time, 3,000 miles to and fro. He has vowed to make one more, and then hopes to find peace. He eats no bread or meat, and drinks no milk. His only food is herbs. I visited him and read to him many passages of Scripture about salvation by God's plan—a free gift of grace. He said that this was a new doctrine to him. The last time I met him, he seemed to have been changed as if he were fitted to give up all his evil thoughts, and he began to read the Bible, and to believe that salvation is by grace and not by works.

" 'I have been working among the Jews, Mohammedans, and others in Jerusalem and the surrounding villages. I have visited synagogues and the Jewish quarters, churches, monasteries, convents of different sects, and many shops and Christian assemblages, so called. I have left Bibles, portions, and leaflets in all of these places, distributing about 1,000 Bibles and portions in fifteen different languages, and [illegible] religious tracts. I rejoice in the work, and my greatest joy is that I believe some souls have been saved through this ministry whom I shall meet in heaven.' "

"I wish to add a few words to this little autobiography," writes Mrs. Woodberry, "hoping to interest some new friends in the Jerusalem work. A new American Church is the desire of our missionaries in Jerusalem, and they are waiting on God for it. Our Baptist boys are giving their Sunday School collections during 1907 for this building fund."

ARMENIA'S DEAD PATRIARCH

ARMENIAN colonies throughout the world are saddened by the news just received of the death of their beloved Catholicos, or Supreme Patriarch, the venerable octogenarian Khrimian "Hairik" Mkrtich I. Khrimian was a typical example of a noble Armenian prelate. Tall, handsome, intensely patriotic, devoutly religious, he was thoroughly modern and progressive in his ideas and administration. Born in 1820 in the city of Van, he devoted himself to the elevation of his oppressed and persecuted fellow-countrymen. He introduced into Armenia American plows and printing presses. He published text-books, established schools and started newspapers, and was himself husbandman, printer, pedagogue, priest and editor. Through his efforts many young men were educated and sent out as teachers. The sick, poor and oppressed went to him for succor and advice. He was known by the endearing name of "Hairik," or "Little Father."

In 1869 he was elected Patriarch, but Turkish persecution forced him to resign his office. During his retirement he wrote several popular books, and in 1878 the Patriarch Varzhapetian sent him with Archbishop Prince Lusignan to Europe, to plead with the delegates at the Congress of Berlin for the Armenian cause. In 1890 the Turkish government exiled him to Jerusalem. But his faithful people continued to remember him, and in 1892 they elected him as their Catholicos, or Supreme Patriarch. He introduced many reforms in the administration of his followers, among them being the establishment of an elective Central Council, and the granting to Armenian women the right to vote. He opposed the spoliation by Russia of the funds and school properties of the Armenians and suspended [illegible]. He died on Nov. 10, after a short illness. Monsignor [illegible]

The Royal Birth*

MANY conjectures have been made as to the nature of the celestial light which guided the wise men to the house where Jesus lay. Some suppose it to have been a comet, others a meteor, others a newly created star, others that conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn which we know occurred about two years before our Lord's birth. That brilliant spectacle appearing in the sky may, it is said, have started the astrologers on their long journey to Palestine, though it can scarcely be regarded as indicating "the house where the young child was." There is to ordinary minds little doubt that it was a miraculous light, specially produced as a guide. It is, however, significant that it brought to Jesus homage and offerings which have seldom been made to any but princes. He whose sovereignty was ridiculed and scoffed at was greeted at his birth by spontaneous gifts, the tributes of men who knew nothing of prophecy, but who were impressed by omens that they interpreted for themselves. It seemed as if they had deceived themselves and had taken their long journey for nothing, for surely a child laid in a manger could not be the mighty king they came to seek. Yet, if they could look on the world to-day, they would see that no king has so many subjects, no name has such reverence as his, at whose feet they laid their gifts that day.

It has been a long pilgrimage from the manger to this recognition, and even yet he has not attained the full extent of his dominion. His kingdom is to be an everlasting kingdom, a universal kingdom and must continue to increase until at his name every knee shall bow. As he wandered about the desert tempted of the devil, is it possible that his prophetic gaze included this triumph? Satan knew and desired to confer the dominion then, if Christ would recognize his suzerainty. But the King would not be a slave, not for a moment would he yield his claims to paramount rule, and through all his humiliation he held his faith. Even as he foresaw the Cross, he did not doubt, but exclaimed, "If I be lifted up, I will draw all men to me." Pilate was puzzled by his prisoner's royalty. It was destitute of the signs and trappings of kings, but the royalty was there. "Art thou a king?" he asked in mockery, and Christ did not disclaim, but gave him the clue to the strange disguise. Neither Pilate nor the world had seen any spectacle like that—a king who conquered his throne by his suffering. It was a strange path to choose, but it is succeeding. The King ruling in the heart and through the affections and gaining subjects in increased numbers in every generation.

Resolved, That the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of New York City deem it wise, in the interests of religion and morality, that the time-honored motto be restored on our specie for coming generations; and it is hereby

WHITTIER'S CHRISTMAS HYMN

SOUND over all waters, reach out from all lands,
The chorus of voices, the clasping of hands;
Sing hymns that were sung by the stars of the morn,
Sing songs of the angels when Jesus was born!
With glad jubilations
Bring hope to the nations!
The dark night is ending and dawn has begun;
Rise, Hope of the ages, arise like the sun,
All speech flow to music, all hearts beat as one!

Sing the bridal of nations! with chorals of love
Sing out the war-vulture and sing in the dove,
Till the hearts of the peoples keep time in accord, [of the Lord!
And the voice of the world is the voice
Clasp hands of the nations
In strong gratulations;
The dark night is ending and dawn has begun;
Rise, Hope of the ages, arise like the sun,
All speech flow to music, all hearts beat as one!

Blow, bugles of battle, the marches of peace;
East, West, North and South, let the long quarrel cease;
Sing the song of great joy that the angels began,
Sing of glory to God and of good-will to man!
Hark! Joining in chorus
The heavens bend o'er us!
The dark night is ending and dawn has begun;
Rise, Hope of the ages, arise like the sun,
All speech flow to music, all hearts beat as one! J. G. WHITTIER.

The Magnificat*

TWO cousins, the one advanced in life and the other a young girl, are introduced to us by the Evangelist. The meeting must have been a strange one, the details of which he may have learned from Mary herself. The aged woman, unaffected by the scandal which Mary's condition might cause, receives her with homage seldom paid in those lands by the elder to the younger. Some special revelation must have been given to her for Mary is greeted as the mother of Elizabeth's Lord, and her visit welcomed as an act of condescension. Elizabeth knows also of the spirit in which Mary received the announcement of the heavenly messenger and congratulates her on her faith. It is then that Mary breaks out in the song known as the Magnificat.

It is a remarkable song for one so young and humble. It breathes the spirit of the Psalms and suggests that Mary must have been familiar with them. The phrases remind us of Hannah's song when she dedicated Samuel to the Lord (I. Sam. 2: 1-10), but Mary is of a more gentle spirit than Samuel's mother, and her soul has not been harassed by the taunts of her rival. She is not made arrogant by the distinction that has come upon her, but is devoutly thankful that God has condescended to one of low estate. Doubtless she knew little of the sorrow she would have to endure in the death of her eldest son, and she probably shared the general belief of Jewish women that the mother of the Messiah would be happy beyond all other women. To her, as to the disciples, the suffering and death of Jesus must have been a mystery, but in her song there is only joy and gratitude. She had to learn that great privileges are often associated with bitter sorrows, but at that time she saw not the sword that, as Simeon warned her, would pierce her soul.

From her personal joy she then turns to the divine beneficence as displayed in his general dealing with her people. She represents God as following his usual course in conferring blessings on the humble, and of passing by the proud and self-satisfied. One can only wonder how this humble girl could have learned so much in a period when women were despised and left in ignorance. In spite of Protestant dogmas, we are forced to believe that she had been specially prepared for the motherhood of Christ. There is a knowledge and a sweet simplicity of character in her song that indicate the divine dealing.

It is only a vague idea that she has of the blessings that were to come from and through her Son. She conceives of him simply as a helper of his nation, perhaps a deliverer, but of the infinite blessings that were to come by the Incarnation she has no idea. That was to be among the revelations of the future, which possibly she never knew until he rose from the dead.

A Thornless Cactus

Luther Burbank, of California, has succeeded in producing a thornless cactus to add to the list of his triumphs in experimental botany. A specimen leaf has already arrived in Washington, and is on exhibition in the United States National Museum. The new plant is of practical value for, without the thorns, the cactus would be a valuable forage plant that grows as well in dry as in moist regions. The flat stem of this plant, often mistakenly called "the leaf," sometimes is three feet long, a foot wide and three inches thick. Its surface is similar to that of the watermelon.

Mr. Burbank believes that originally this species of cactus had no thorns, but nature provided the points to protect the plant from browsing cattle. He has turned the plant back to its original form.

THE TRUE CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AS we have been studying Old Testament lessons, and in previous review have recalled what Moses knew of Christ, it is fitting we should now recall all the prophecies of Christ, which together will give us the Old Testament Gospel.

First, men were told of what race Jesus would be—the seed of the woman (Gen. 3: 15). Then God told from which son of Noah Jesus should descend: "He shall dwell in the tents of Shem" (Gen. 9: 27). Then, little by little, God's prophets foretold that Jesus would be a descendant of Abraham (Gen. 22: 18), of Jacob (Num. 24: 27), of Judah (Gen. 49: 10), of Jesse (Isa. 11: 1), of David (Ps. 132: 11, 12), that his mother would be a virgin (Isa. 7: 14), and that his name should be one that the mouth of the Lord should name (Isa. 62: 2). Then the prophets foretold that Jesus would be born in Bethlehem (Micah 5: 2) at a certain time (Dan. 9: 25-27), with a star over his cradle (Num. 24: 17), which wise men and kings would follow from far-off lands to bring him presents and worship him (Ps. 72: 11-15). The prophets also said that he would be carried into Egypt (Hos. 11: 1), that he would in his manhood heal the blind, the lame and the sick (Isa. 35: 5, 6) and feed the multitudes (Isa. 40: 2), and enter Jerusalem as a king (Zech. 9: 9). Last of all he was to suffer and die in our stead (Isa. 53), and rise from the grave into heaven (Ps. 68: 18). From heaven he would come again every day, though we cannot see him, to stand at our side and help us to be Christians (Matt. 28: 20). Some day he would come again in his "glorious appearing" to be the acknowledged King of earth and heaven (Titus 2: 13; Rom. 14: 11).

If a mind-reader could look into the hearts of a thousand children of Christian Sunday Schools as Christmas draws near for the two chief thoughts about Christmas, he would probably find that feasting and receiving presents were at the front in nearly all these little hearts, whereas under proper training by homes and churches the two ideas that would tower above all others at this season would be: The conversion of children and the missionary conquest of the world for Christ.

Christ became a child that children might become Christians, therefore it ought to be self-evident that one main purpose of Christ in becoming a child was to get near to the children as one who had himself been one of them, and so to save them in early years. It is amazing how few churches have even yet heeded the protest of Jesus to those who hold back the children, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." That, of course, does not mean heaven above, but the fellowship of the heavenly-minded on earth, of which the church is a part. Of like import are Jesus' words, "Except ye repent and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18: 3; Mark 10: 13-16), and those other profound words about "these little ones that believe in me" (Matt. 18: 6). Of like significance are Paul's words congratulating Timothy that "from early childhood he has known the Holy Scriptures which have made him wise unto salvation."

The Essentials of Religion

In spite of these words and John's teaching that it is by love and life that we learn of God, rather than by metaphysical subtlety, thousands assume that no one should join the church, or even confess himself a Christian, who does not understand all the philosophical mysteries of catechisms and creeds. In fact, the doctrines thus used to bar out the children are not understood by the persons who put up these bars between Christ and the children for whose salvation he became the lowliest of children. The essentials of religion are all in three words which the children are better able to understand than older people, for they are part of a child's daily habit: Love, trust and obey. To become a Christian is to love, trust and obey the heavenly Father as a child is accustomed to love, trust and obey an earthly parent. In a prayer-meeting an old man prayed, "O Lord, give me a giant's faith." But in a moment, grown wiser by recalling his Bible, he said, "No, Lord, give me a child's faith." Another old man, over seventy years of age, in a revival meeting lamented in tears his wicked, wasted life. Being urged to pray he knelt with difficulty, saying he did not know how to pray, but presently the prayer he had learned from his mother in childhood came back to mind, and having "become as a little child" he prayed there in the words once familiar to him:

> Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
> Look upon a little child.
> Pity my simplicity
> Suffer me to come to thee.

This is a good place to recall the Bible prayer believed to have been written by the great lawyer three thousand years ago for children: "Satisfy us early with thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days."

> If we seek him early,
> If we come to-day;
> We can be his little friends,
> He has said we may.

For the children who have already become the friends of Jesus, the Christmas season is the time to behold Christ as an example and celebrate the great festival by greater likeness to him. In a city square was put up the marble statue of a beautiful girl, an ideal figure. A dirty, unwashed, ragged girl of the slums came and looked at it long and earnestly. Then she looked at herself. She came again the next day, and it was noticed that her face was washed and her hair combed. She gazed again long and earnestly at the statue. The next day she came again, and the tear in her ragged dress had been neatly sewed. A like case where the pattern was living is the following:

A good Boston woman complained bitterly that an Italian family had moved into her neighborhood. Of trade before he made healing "the divine profession."

> Ah, how his patience conquers our despondency!
> How frenzied at our faltering appears
> Did he not love us as those years passed
> And yet his days in quiet [illegible]
> He knew the cause whereunto he was sent
> His world stood waiting, there [illegible]
> For him to wipe the dust upon their brows
> To be awaked, and men called to repent
> And [illegible] to be loosed, the [illegible]
> Of Calvary to climb; yet [illegible]
> Encouraged he calmly worked [illegible]
> The time was come. O Blessed Lord, we pray
> That by thy life we may live [illegible]
> And in thy path may follow patiently.

The nations coming to the Christ! This is the supreme meaning of Christmas, and especially of Matthew's story: "The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising. The kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts." It would seem too clear for argument that the climax of a true Christmas should be the offering of our prayers, and ourselves to Christ for the salvation of the world.

The most absurdly inappropriate thing to do at Christmas is the very thing oftenest done: the taking up a collection to stuff the Sunday School children with candy at the very time when every pound should be used to be overloaded with it. The object to the children's bodies from missing Christmas candy is [illegible] A truth to the injury to them [illegible] charity a feast for the body and the selfishness, [illegible] every ingredient should be used to keep [illegible] mind on the supreme idea of giving that is Christ, and its means to enlarge the [illegible] the heathen far away.

Mr. George Grenfell, a missionary on the Congo, described by the Missionary Herald as "the pathfinder for the King," tells the following story of his first voyage: "The Peace was surrounded by a flotilla of canoes, manned by cannibals, and spears [illegible] were put out from behind the islands. The river seemed black with them, and the barrage continued for some [illegible] arrow guards with wires, the [illegible] used [illegible] in those days. When [illegible] the question came up to shelter or not the [illegible] how on board should be said [illegible] sort of the wife and child. 'Come [illegible] be, here on the water.' The [illegible] mouths of the natives and the [illegible] they had [illegible] all [illegible] little craft slipped out of [illegible]

"When I Was a Midshipman"

By Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee

He deliberately reaffirmed everything. Then we proved that according to his own statements he was nearly 244 years of age. "Tom" held his ground in a seamanlike manner, and merely replied: "Gentlemen, I don't know nothing about your algeburg, but try me on geography, and I'm right there every time."

At present our men average very young. This is due to the rapid expansion. Already they are as fine shots as there are in the world. They are clever and adaptive and every day adds to their efficiency. The moral tone of our crews is improving also. A notable sign is that the men in general tend to resent the presence of a rascal in their midst. Ambition and emulation are growing. The seeming objection, on some sides, to admit our uniformed men to places of public amusement, does not take note of the social quality of very many modern men-of-war's men. No small number of them, probably, are of higher social degree in civil life than some of those who would turn them out. To form this opinion, one has only to see the people of both sexes who visit our men on board ship. Commanding officers, when invited, lead the opening march at the balls that our men give on shore. I, myself, have been delighted at being asked. I think there is not a commanding officer in the service who would not feel similarly pleased. In the British army and navy, we find the same spirit of recognition of the improved moral and social quality of the men.

When I entered the navy there were no canned provisions. The ration was bad. As I write it, visions of "salt-horse" rise before me. Also I recall the refinement of old Zebedee, the midshipmen's colored steward, on a summer's practice cruise, who would announce: "Yes, suh, pickled beef and crackers for dinner to-day, suh, yes, suh." What we had were "salt-horse" and "hardtack." Then the midshipmen had the crew's fare on the summer cruises, with an occasional salt mackerel thrown in as a lollipop. The water was frequently vile. Now, we have canned provisions in endless variety and cold storage on board for our fresh meats. We distil the water on board, and make our ice on board from distilled water. Our ration is now probably the best in the world. Then, the men were served from tinware while gathered about a tarpaulin spread on the deck. This gave an equal chance to the pet pig, and he commonly tried to take his chance. The soups and meats, also the coffee and tea, so called, were "done" by the ship's cook, who had "picked up" his knowledge, and picked it up badly. Landsmen from the deck, in tours of duty, made the "entrees and desserts." Now there is a general mess, with a bill of fare prepared by proper authority. The men sit at tables and eat from graniteware. Competent cooks are provided. The old-time man-of-war's man was every inch a man. He took his punishment as he took his medicine—always looking pleasant. Just the same, he was a private growler by profession. There was no venom in his growl commonly; it was rather the exercise of a nautical habit. One night, while reefing topsails, I overheard this conversation: "Johnny, this is the worst ship I ever seen yet." "What's the matter, Billy?" "Why, Johnny, the pies was cold at supper-time." In those days it was commonly held as the rule by officers that they could not gain the favor of the men by treating them to that end. The men did not expect to be coddled. They wanted fair treatment and consistency. The officer who gave them that and was efficient and masterful, got their good will even though he were very strict. All their sports were rough. Somebody had to get hurt if there was to be any enjoyment, or else there must be great risk of getting hurt. Now, nearly every ship has its trained baseball and football teams and boxing is a preferred sport.

So far as foresight can manage, the navy enlists only good, sober and industrious men. It is not a school for incorrigibles. To good men it offers many advantages of promotion and pay, and also retirement with pay or pension. It gives continuous employment, medical service free, provision for the allotment of part of the pay to dependent relatives on shore, and the right to deposit money with the paymaster at four per cent. interest. For those who enter very young there are training stations. Special training is given at artificer, electrical, yeoman, musician, and hospital training schools for those who enlist in those branches. About sixty dollars' worth of outfit is given free on first enlistment. It is possible for the right kind of boy to enter at seventeen, become a chief petty officer at twenty-five, warrant officer at twenty-six, serve as warrant officer four years and secure a commission at thirty, which would probably retire him as captain at sixty-two, with a retired pay of $2,625 per annum. As many as ten warrant officers have been commissioned as ensigns in one year and twelve are possible. There are various rewards and honors to the deserving. There is much "literature" on these matters which may be obtained from the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, or from the recruiting offices. A good career is open in the navy, but hardly for those romantic lads who set out to be Howling Buccaneers of the Roaring Spanish Main.

Going to sea in the navy is not what it used to be. It is far easier. I have been sixty days at sea in a sailing ship without sighting land, and have rolled "in the same hole" in the doldrums of the equator for three whole weeks at a time. Our modern vessels make quick passages. Those old "sawed-off" sailing ships were wallowers, "right and left and head and tail," but our battleships, by comparison, are as "steady as churches." Dibdin's old sea song, "Barney Buntline; or the Sailor's Consolation," has some merit to-day:

One night came on a hurricane, the seas was mountains rolling,
When Barney Buntline turned his quid, and said to Billy Bowling:
"A strong sou'wester's blowing, Bill, oh, don't you hear it roar now?
Lord help 'em! how I pities all unhappy folks on shore now.

Foolhardy chaps what lives in towns, what dangers they are all in,
And now lie quaking in their beds for fear the roof should fall in;
Poor creatures, how they envy us, and wishes (I've a notion)
For our good luck in such a storm to be upon the ocean.

And as for them who're out all day on business from their houses,
And late at night are coming home to cheer their babes and spouses;
While you and I, Bill, on the deck are comfortably lying—
My eyes! what tiles and chimney-pots about their heads are flying!

How often have we seamen heard how men are killed and undone
By overturns of carriages, and thieves and fires in London!
We know what risks all landsmen run, from noblemen to tailors—
Then, Bill, let us thank Providence that you and I are sailors.

But to revert from the great Dibdin to myself, a midshipmite, let me say that I worried through the Naval Academy in four years, and was sent to sea in the Civil War in the class with Evans, Coghlan, Gridley, Clark, Cook, and others who have made themselves well known since that day. As to some later events, more hereafter.

MEMORY IMPROVED

Since Leaving Off Coffee.

Many persons suffer from poor memory who never suspect coffee has anything to do with it.

The drug—caffeine—in coffee, acts injuriously on the nerves and heart, causing imperfect circulation, too much in the brain at one time, too little in another part. This often causes a dullness, which makes a good memory nearly impossible.

"I am nearly 70 years old and did not know that coffee was the cause of the stomach and heart trouble I suffered from for many years, until about four years ago," writes a Kans. woman.

"A kind neighbor induced me to quit coffee and try Postum. I had been suffering severely and was greatly reduced in flesh. After using Postum a little while I found myself improving; my heart beats became regular and now I seldom ever notice any symptoms of my old stomach trouble at all. My nerves are steady and my memory decidedly better than while I was using coffee.

"I like the taste of Postum fully as well as coffee. My sister told me two years ago that she did not like it, but when I showed her how to make it according to directions, she thought it was delicious.

"It is best to pour cold water over your Postum, let it come to a boil, then boil 15 minutes. That brings out the flavor and full food value."

"There's a Reason."

it had miserably failed. It was helpless and hopeless; it was weary and sick at heart. Its religions had proved to be utterly powerless. Rome was sinking in helpless moral corruption, with all her great military power. Greece, with all her art, poetry and philosophy, could only erect on Mars' Hill an altar with the inscription: "To the Unknown God." Thus Greece and Rome gave the world a negative preparation for the coming of Christ. Judaism had its part in a positive preparation for that coming; but Judaism had become the victim of cold formalities or of petty ceremonials. Just when the darkness was deepest, the Day-star arose, flooding the earth with heavenly light and glory.

It was also a time of profound peace. The temple of Janus was closed. The tradition was that King Numa Pompilius had built the shrine of Janus, and ordained that the gates should be closed only in time of peace. It is affirmed that they were closed only three times in seven hundred years. The third time was in the time of Augustus, when Christ, the Prince of Peace, was born in Bethlehem. Thus Milton sang:

Nor war or battle's sound was heard the world around;
The idle spear and shield were high uplung.
The hooked chariot stood unstained with hostile blood,
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng.
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovereign Lord was by.

It was fitting that he who was the Prince of Peace should come to earth when the noise of war had ceased, and when the song of the angels found its fulfilment in the huts of peasants and in the palaces of kings.

The Place of this Wondrous Birth

Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea. It was marvelous that the dim prophecy, uttered seven hundred years before by the prophet Micah, that Bethlehem in Judea, the city of David, should be the place of the Messiah's birth, should have its fulfilment. Mary and Joseph were in Nazareth. How is it possible that this prophecy can be fulfilled? In order that it may be fulfilled, the Roman Emperor Augustus determines that a census shall be taken, that he may discover the resources of his kingdom. This general registration Herod directs shall be made after the Jewish, rather than the Roman, method. Think what was involved in the fulfilment of that ancient prophecy! From their home in Nazareth Joseph and Mary made their weary way over the wintry roads to Bethlehem. Their fortunes were fallen, but they were both of the house and lineage of David. The Jews still clung to the memory of their tribal relations, and this long journey was undertaken, even in these most trying circumstances, that Joseph and Mary might be registered at the headquarters of the family. If it had not been for this census, ordered for merely human ends, Nazareth and not Bethlehem had been the birthplace of Jesus. Marvelous is it how the kings of the earth unconsciously perform their part in the fulfilment of prophecy, and in the accomplishment of God's eternal plans!

Sweet memories gather about the little town of Bethlehem. It is six miles to the south of Jerusalem. One thousand years before the birth of Jesus it was the home of David, the royal psalmist and the divine hero of Israel. Near Bethlehem Ruth gleaned in the fields of the noble Boaz—Ruth, destined to be an ancestress of both David and Jesus. Bethlehem is inseparably associated with the names of Rachel, Noami, Ruth and Mary. This little town has become immortal; its name has been chanted in sweetest songs to the ends of the earth. Music and poetry, and art and religion have combined to link the name of Bethlehem with the Name that is above every name in heaven or on earth.

We may well sing with the beloved Phillips Brooks:

O little town of Bethlehem, how still we see thee lie.
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep the silent stars go by;
Yet in thy dark streets shineth the everlasting light:
The hopes and fears of all the years are met in thee tonight.

Lessons from the Wondrous Birth

From the worship of the Magi we learn the right use of wealth and culture. Who were these wise men? Originally they formed a priestly tribe or caste among the Medes, and later among the Medo-Persians. They were the recognized teachers of religion and science. They wielded vast power in the great Persian Empire. They were students of astronomy, medicine, divination and incantation. They brought their gold, their frankincense, and their myrrh and laid them at the feet of the infant Christ. They were the sages, the philosophers, the literati of their time. All learning finds its true place when consecrated to Christ. We claim all literature, philosophy, science, and art for Jesus; all gold belongs to our Christ. When the treasures of the world are consecrated to him, missions will flourish, hospitals will prosper, churches will abound, and the dawn of the millennium will color the Eastern sky with its crimson and gold.

We learn also at the cradle of the Christ, that love is mightier than regal power. No babe ever lay in lowlier cradle than that of Jesus Christ. The manger-cradle in Bethlehem harmonized with the carpenter shop in Nazareth. True greatness consists in what one is, and not in what one has. When Jesus lay in the manger-cradle, the foremost man in the world was the Emperor Augustus. His word was law; his nod awed the nations. Nations bowed in submission to his will. What cared he for a peasant babe in Bethlehem? What to him and his court was the lowly group in the stable of the khan, because there was no room in the inn? Behold the contrast to-day: What has become of the throne of the Cæsars? What signifies now mere human power? Time has overturned that throne, and comparatively few to-day know the history or the name of that Cæsar. But behold to-day the empire of Jesus Christ. It is the empire of pure, personal and heavenly love. This empire endures forever.

The Cradle and the Grave

We learn also how poverty may be dignified. Christ was the only child ever born into this world who had his choice as to how he should come. He might have come in royal splendor with ten thousand times the pomp and glory of earthly kings. He chose to come in poverty. He has put a halo of splendor around every lowly home, and filled it with the radiance of heaven. This lowly cradle honors childhood. Christ sanctified by his presence the cradle as truly as the grave. Every child may now be a Christ-child, every village a Bethlehem, and every cradle a prophecy of the Christ.

Bending over the cradle of the infant Redeemer, we see how motherhood is crowned, glorified, and celestialized. A halo of supernal splendor surrounds the brow of every noble mother. The birth of Jesus has illumined the world with the light of heaven, and made it possible for every mother, in some measure, to be the mother of the Christ. I summon you to make room for Jesus, O business men, in your offices, shops and stores; O professional men, in your books and briefs; O householders, at your tables, hearths and altars; O preachers, in your pulpits, lips and hearts; O mothers, in your loftiest aspirations, in your lowliest prayers, and in the tenderest loves of your hearts, make room for Jesus! When the Christ is thus born anew in every home and heart, this Christmastide shall be a sweet echo of the angelic song at Bethlehem, and a true prophecy of the celestial choir of heaven.

Three Hundred Babies Wanted—

With the November issue THE DELINEATOR started a "CHILD-RESCUE Campaign," the bringing into the home that needs a child the child that needs a home. There are 2,000,000 homes in America that know not the joys that children bring. There are 25,000 children in New York alone who know not what home means.

We started this campaign with fear and doubt. To ask strangers to us to adopt these little ones, equally strangers to us, seemed daring indeed. And we could appeal to only a million homes,—the million homes into which THE DELINEATOR goes—not one-twentieth of all the homes in this great country. Caution made us tell the stories of only two. We feared that even these might not be asked for. We doubted the greatness of the great American heart. We doubted, and we are ashamed.

Over three hundred eager hands have already been extended. Three hundred requests for these little ones—for any homeless little one—have already been received through the mails. Women have come for miles away into our building asking for these precious ones; men have journeyed a thousand miles to beg one for their homes. We told their story; we appealed to our worshiped American womanhood, and it hastens to take these little ones into its heart. We continue this campaign for homes for other homeless waifs in the December DELINEATOR. We shall keep on with it. If one brief appeal to one-twentieth of the homes in America can bring this result, what of good may we not yet do?

We are proud of the December DELINEATOR. It contains many notable features. We are proud of our work for the year; proud that we stand acknowledged as the greatest fashion authority in the world; proud of the many famous people who have contributed to our pages. But it is not in these that our greatest pride lies.

The "Child-Rescue Campaign," the homeless child, the childless home, the bringing of these little ones into the homes where little ones are needed, this movement is of our pride and of our heart. And you—will you make it of your heart? Will you give us such assistance as you can?

Questions and Answers

Reader, Xenia, O. I see you say Mr. and Mrs. Jansen are at Cebu in the Philippines and their parish includes one hundred islands. How many islands are there in the Philippines? How came the islands to be there in the midst of the sea?

There are in all some 3,141 islands in the Philippine archipelago, of which only 342 are inhabited and 366 have an area exceeding one square mile, while 31 are 100 square miles or more. The islands are largely volcanic. The people are of Malayan origin, except the Negritos, who represent the original inhabitants. Spanish is largely spoken, but there are many native dialects. About one-fourth are uncivilized, and a few tribes, like the Moros, are fierce and warlike.

J. J. T., Sharon Hill, Pa. What was the revelation of the man of sin that Paul referred to in II. Thess. 2: 3?

Paul evidently believed that immediately before the second coming of Christ there would be fierce temptation and persecution. Christ referred to the same event (see Matt. 24: 20-25). The man of sin is the Antichrist or Pseudo-Christ, who is to deceive many. He is described in Rev. 13: 11-18.

A. G. B., Germantown, Pa. What American city was the first to use illuminating gas?

Richmond, Va., is said to have erected the first gas plant ever known. It was only in operation a few weeks, however, and the regular installation of gas for lighting purposes did not take place until long afterward. Baltimore was the first American city to have gas-lighted streets.

Mrs. D. A. P., Columbia, S. C. 1. What is the spiritual meaning of pomegranate in the Scriptures? 2. What women were Europe, Asia, Africa and Australia named after? 3. What does the "hornet" mean in Ex. 23: 28?

1. It seems to have been used as a sacred symbol in heathen religions and was frequently reproduced in Egyptian sculptures. It was a type of beauty and fertility. 2. Europe after the heathen goddess Europa, Asia after the nymph Asia, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (and the fabled wife of Japheth), Africa, derivation unknown; Australasia, derived from Asia, meaning Southern or Farther Asia. 3. Commentators are divided as to the interpretation of "hornet" in this passage. Some take it to refer to the swarms of Canaanites, others interpret it as the symbol of terror, meaning that God would send fear before them to intimidate their enemies. Cases are recorded where certain localities in the Orient have been temporarily depopulated by attacks of hornets.

The Late Sir George Williams

The Proposed Y. M. C. A. Williams Memorial to Be Erected in London

A PROJECT of world-wide interest is the proposed Y. M. C. A. building to be erected in the British metropolis as a permanent memorial of the life-work of the late Sir George Williams, founder of the Young Men's Christian Association. It will be in the very centre of London, at the junction of Oxford Street, Tottenham Court Road and Charing Cross Road, easily accessible from all points, and will be a great central home for the many activities of the organization. This mammoth building will contain besides reception rooms, social rooms, secretaries' offices and board rooms, a suite specially designed for Bible study, accommodations for the various foreign sections, a Business Men's College, with lecture rooms, class rooms, laboratories, etc., also halls for evangelistic meetings, foreign missionary lectures and lantern services, a restaurant and tea room, a gymnasium, swimming pool, reading, game, and social rooms for boys, etc. The upper floors will be occupied as a residential home, and will contain 300 bedrooms, to be rented at low figures to youths just beginning business life. The building as projected will cost $1,000,000, one half of which has yet to be provided. The Y. M. C. A. of the United States, having signified a desire to be represented in this world-wide memorial, are to have an opportunity to contribute to the erection of an American Memorial Hall or Chapel, which will be a part of the main structure. It is believed that American interest in the project is such that many thousands will avail themselves of this opportunity to share in the magnificent tribute to the founder. Our illustration, taken from the architect's drawing, is furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by the courtesy of Mr. J. H. Putterill, general secretary of the Central Y. M. C. A. of London, who is now in this country to attend the Association Convention.

BOTH GAINED

Man and Wife Fatten on Grape-Nuts.

The notion that meat is necessary for real strength and the foundation of solid flesh is now no longer as prevalent, as formerly.

Excessive meat eaters are usually sluggish a part of the time because they are not able to fully digest their food, and the undigested portion is changed into what is practically a kind of poison that acts upon the blood and nerves, thus getting all through the system.

"I was a heavy meat eater," writes an Ills. man, "and up to two years ago was in very poor health. I suffered with indigestion so that I only weighed 95 pounds.

"Then I heard about Grape-Nuts and decided to try it. My wife laughed at me at first, but when I gained to 125 pounds and felt so fine, she thought she would eat Grape-Nuts too.

"Now she is fat and well and has gained 40 pounds. We never have indigestion any more and seldom feel the desire for meat. A neighbor of ours, 68 years old, was troubled with indigestion for years; was a heavy meat eater; and now, since he has been eating Grape-Nuts regularly, he says he is well and never has indigestion. I could name a lot of persons who have really been relieved of indigestion by changing from a heavy meat diet to Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

R. B. D., West Brookfield, Mass. 1. How is Transvaal pronounced? 2. What is the Cullinan diamond?

1. It is pronounced Trans-val, with the last "a" long. 2. It is a diamond of seven ounces, discovered in South Africa and presented to King Edward on his recent birthday. A picture of the diamond and an account of the presentation appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 27.

E. M. K., Thompsonville, Conn. Would like to ask how a white counterpane, with Ich Dien under three ostrich plumes woven in it as the centre design, happened to be for sale some fifty years ago in this country.

It is a motto of the Prince of Wales. It is translated "I serve," though some writers state that it was first used by Edward, son of Edward I., and that the Welsh words were originally Eich dyn ("Behold the man"). The account is found in both French and British histories. The motto was worn under the plume of ostrich feathers on the helmet of the King of Bohemia, slain at the battle of Crecy while serving as a volunteer in the French army, August 26, 1346. Edward, the Black Prince, so called from the color of his armor, who won the battle, adopted the motto out of respect to his father, who was commander-in-chief. The motto and three feathers have since been borne by the heir to the British crown. The tapestry in question might have been the property of some one not necessarily of royal birth, as the motto has long been used decoratively on special occasions in Great Britain.

D. F. T., Rochester, N.Y. When was the day first divided into hours?

The day is said to have been divided into twenty-four hours in 293 B.C., when L. Papirius Cursor put up a sun-dial in the temple of Quirinus at Rome. The Egyptians divided day and night each into twelve hours. They probably got it from the Babylonians.

H. S., Cottekill, N. Y. What causes convergency of meridians and what effect does such convergency have upon the boundary lines of government surveys?

This letter has been submitted to the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Washington, D.C., and Superintendent H. Fittmann, of that bureau, has kindly favored us with this answer:

"For an explanation of the convergence of meridians, consult any good text-book on surveying, as, for example, page 154 of The Principles and Practice of Surveying, by Charles B. Breed and George L. Hosmer, Wiley & Sons. The question in regard to the effect of the convergence of meridians upon government surveys is so indefinite, that it is not possible to answer it properly. In general, it may be stated that the convergence of meridians is properly taken into account in surveys which cover a sufficiently large area to make it necessary to do so."

C. S. W., Norwich, Conn. What is tungsten, mentioned in books on steel making?

Tungsten is a whitish, hard, brittle metal. Scheele in 1781 obtained tungstic acid, whence the DeLujart Brothers obtained the metal. In 1859 it was first used in making a new kind of steel.

C. H. B., Red Bank, N. J. In reading your account of the golden wedding anniversary of the Rev. Henry Varley and wife, it brought to my mind that some forty odd years ago I listened to a Rev. Henry Varley in the Congregational Tabernacle Church at Thirty-fourth Street and Sixth Avenue, New York. Is he the same man?

As there is but one Varley, you have doubtless heard him during one of his early visits to the United States. He has been here several times.

L. T., Freeport, N. Y. Can you give me some of the main facts concerning the African Sahara?

It is the name given to the great tract in Africa between the Nile valley, the Atlantic Ocean and the inner slope of the Barbary plateau. It has an area of 2,500,000 square miles. The word Sahara is from the Arabic word Sara or Zaharah, which means a desert. In the interior are a few green habitable places that are known as oases. Several hot winds blow outward from the desert during different seasons of the year. The entire Sahara has but few inhabitants. It came under French influence in 1890. The next year a large natural reservoir of water was discovered at El Golea.

A Faithful Christian's Life Ended

ALBERT BRADLEY WADHAMS, who passed away in New York recently, was born in that city about seventy-one years ago. The son of pious parents, he began religious work very early in life. He was brought up in the Methodist Church, and in his later years became connected with the famous Brooklyn Tabernacle (Dr. Talmage's church), where he served on the board of elders for several years. He was a broad-minded Christian, and actively interested in the propagation of the Gospel at home and abroad. He was a devoted student of the Bible, and especially conversant with the prophecies. Able articles from his pen, treating of prophetic subjects, have appeared at different times in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Wadhams entered the service of the American Bible Society April 11, 1860, and from that time until his last sickness he was uninterruptedly in the Society's employ, filling positions of trust and responsibility.

He was very active in temperance work, and was nominated by his Prohibition friends on several occasions for office, but he was not a politician and cared little for political honors. He was just beginning to see the fruit of the long years of Prohibition effort throughout the country when he passed away. Funeral services were held in the Park Avenue Methodist Church, Eighty-sixth Street and Park Avenue, New York, and were largely attended. Mr. Wadhams, who had been a widower many years, left no children of his own. He had two adopted children, on whose care and training he lavished the love of a parent. He will be remembered by all who knew him as an exemplary Christian, a faithful friend, a generous helper to all in need, and a man who, having the love of Christ in his heart, improved every opportunity to win souls for the Master.

Endorsements of HEART THROBS

There is Only One Book in the World, of 400 Pages, which is the Work of 50,000 People—that Book is "HEART THROBS"

Extract from editorial review of HEART THROBS in CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 6, 1907:

"Heart Throbs is certainly one of the most notable books issued in recent years. The stories are the brightest imaginable. Some are sublimely descriptive pieces of word-painting, others full of pathos, and still others have a wit that convulses us with laughter. Many a scrap-book and old desk has been made to yield its choicest treasures. Best of all, there is not a trite or commonplace page in the whole volume."

You'll never grow tired of Heart Throbs because it wears because it is made of the literature that endures. Every mother loves Heart Throbs, for within its 400 pages are the heart to heart sentiments the favorite selections of thousands of mothers, beautifully expressed, which put into the cares of daily trials and practicing the necessity of motherhood. Every father finds in Heart Throbs a keen delight in the sweet hours while philosophizing on the kernels of human nature found in the selections sent in by thousands of fathers like himself. And so it is all down the line.

I am delighted with the book. It is just the book to keep by one; to peep into when one needs encouragement and inspiration. MRS. L. E. MOORE, Pennsylvania.

What do I think of "Heart Throbs"? I think it unsurpassed for pathos and sweetness, wit and humor. I wish every Christian minister possessed a copy of it. JANE F. SWANSON, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Gipsy Smith's Son a Revivalist

REVIVAL services fruitful in results were conducted in Brooklyn, N. Y., lately by Evangelists Wm. H. Friday, Jr., and Albany R. Smith, a son of Gipsy Smith, the famous revivalist. Like his father, Albany Smith is a powerful and effective Gospel singer. He was born twenty-seven years ago at Newcastle-on-Tyne. He had the restless spirit of his people, and wandered away from home when a boy of thirteen, and his father did not see him again till he returned with a wife and baby boy. He says: "I did not seem able to stay in one place, but roved and roved the world around." While on a long voyage, he was thrown into the society of an earnest Christian sailor who led him to the Saviour.

Albany R. Smith

Albany worked with his father in revival services in England and America. Being a fine solo singer, he worked for a time with Rev. S. F. Collier, of the Salford Wesleyan Mission, England. Last April he came to this country, and has since that time been associated with Evangelist Friday. The latter was formerly an actor and theatrical song-writer and publisher in New York City. After his conversion he gave up writing songs for the stage and began writing hymns and Christian songs.

she had been left alone. When her visitors had been warmed and fed and had sat by the fire until they were rested, she led the way to her guest chambers, and there made them welcome to luxurious beds.

"God bless you, lady," said the old man, as he and his old wife said good-night.

Mrs. Whitfield helped the little mother to undress, and saw her and the baby made comfortable. The grandmother had told her that the girl-wife was a widow, and that the child had been born after its father's death. She went softly downstairs, stopping in her own room to rummage in a bureau drawer. From its depths she extracted a long white box. Opening it she lifted with gentle hands one little frock after another, sheer and soft and trimmed with lace, and taking little shoes and little socks turned and went back to the room she had left. The young mother was kneeling by the bed. She rose as Mrs. Whitfield entered. "You tell me that you came," she said, "from Sussex? Were you born at such a place?" and the lady named a little hamlet where she had spent several happy years when her daughter was a child.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Do you remember a lady and a little girl who lodged with your mother? Perhaps you were too young to remember. The little girl's name was Edith, and she played with you and liked you better than her doll. I was not quite sure until I thought it all over a moment ago, when it came to me like a flash. I must be altered or your father and mother would have known me. Here, dear, take these things. They are for your baby. It is as if the Christ-Child himself had come to me to-night, breaking the ice in my heart and making me alive again."

Truth is stranger than fiction. The next morning, Christmas morning, as they sat at breakfast, Mrs. Whitfield recalled herself to the old man and woman, whose wayfaring feet had led them to her door. "You are really my friends," she said, "and I am going to keep you with me here in this lonesome, empty house, until the winter is gone and the bright, beautiful spring has come again. Christmas has brought to me, a stranger in this place, a bit of the life I had when I was young, the life that now seems to have been lived by some one else, and not by me."

The people in Antrim never discovered how it was that the quaint old husband and wife, and the pretty young woman and lovely babe, who were established in Mrs. Whitfield's home as if they were kith and kin, came to her that Christmas Eve. She kept her own counsel, and Uncle Robert was no gossip. They came and they stayed. That was all Antrim people ever knew, but the Merry Christmas they brought made Mrs. Whitfield so motherly and dear that she ceased to be a stranger and became everybody's friend.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The "Clan" System in China*

THE typical Chinese household consists of the parents, their sons, who probably have been married while still in their teens, the daughters-in-law, who have come without courtship or pretense of affection into their new home to be the servants of their mother-in-law, and their children. The daughters of the family, on arriving at marriageable age, have become members of other households and are seen only on occasional visits in a circle where they no longer have any rights. Property is held in common, though it is sometimes divided before the death of the father. The rights of the parents over their children are absolute. The father, and after his death, the mother, may chastise, sell, or even kill a son or daughter. As for the wife, from the moment she enters the house of her husband, "she ceases to have a wish that he is legally bound to respect."

Even after the branches of the family separate into different households, the worship of their ancestors preserves a bond between them, and beyond this lies the constraint of the clan, the members of which live together in villages and have an ancestral temple in common.

The mutual responsibility of the family also tends to check innovation as well as wrong-doing. The father is responsible for the son as long as they both live, and the son is held accountable for his father's debts. In case of crime, other members of the family who have not had the slightest share in its commission may be punished. The clan, the neighbors, and those who have had the most distant relations with the culprit may also be involved. Archdeacon Gray cites a case in which a man flogged his mother, aided by his wife. In consequence, the pair were flayed alive; the granduncle, uncle, two elder brothers, and head of the clan to which the men belonged were executed; the neighbors who lived on each side, the father of the woman and the head representative of the literary degree which the man held, were flogged and banished; the prefect and district ruler were for a time deprived of their rank; and the child of the offenders was given another name. Such mutual responsibility, if it be unavoidable, makes people watchful of each other, and especially makes the elders look with suspicious eye upon any aberration from the accustomed order on the part of their subordinates.

Even if the entire family should be united in its desire to adopt new ideas, it would be held in place by the traditions of the clan. The power of the clan elders, which extends in certain circumstances even to capital punishment, may surely be counted upon as on the side of well-seasoned precedent. The clan traditions, like those of the family, are not considered matters of mere convenience, but as possessing the sanctity of religion. In early society, custom and morals are identical, and from this attitude of mind China has not yet emerged. The worship of the family and clan ancestors has formed an effective barrier to change. Reverence for parents combines with fear of offending the spirits, in keeping the feet of the living in the paths which their fathers have trod. If a man should depart from the way approved by the past generation, he might bring a curse upon the whole community.

What the father is to the family, and the elder or headman to the clan or village, that is the local magistrate to his district, the governor to his province, and the emperor to the whole empire. Each official has authority over those below him, and is responsible to those above him for the general good behavior of his constituency. While in theory the government, like the oversight of the father, is for the welfare of the people, in actual practise the power granted to those in office is usually utilized for selfish ends. A great variety of civil and criminal functions are concentrated in the hands of one man, which gives him great opportunity for abuse. There is a system of checks and balances whereby oppression is kept within limits, but overtaxing, acceptance of bribes, minor extortion, and irregularities are the rule and not the exception.

The Gollemogg's Christmas, with verses by Bertha Lipton and pictures by Florence K. Upton, is another book of bright jingles and colored pictures for children. It is one of a series of thirteen little books that have dealt with the remarkable "doings" of the two Dutch dolls and a Gollemogg. The Gollemogg is a wonderful creature, but the best way to make his acquaintance is to read the book. Cloth cover, 63 pages, illustrated. Price $2. Longmans, Green & Co., New York, publishers.

Andrew Lang is one of the most prolific author and editors of the day, and yet, despite th number of books that bear his name, he is one o the best. Quantity and quality seem to go hand in hand in his case. The latest product of his is the Olive Faery Book. Mr. Lang has gone to the old fairy tales of Perrault, who used to amuse the courtiers of Louis XIV. with his imagery; to the Far East, to Denmark and other parts of the Northland for the legend and folklore of this book. As the sources are innumerable, so are the stories in their variety of interest. He declares in the preface that he wrote it for the little people, but the grown-ups who are called upon to read it aloud for the benefit of the younger generation may well be pardoned if on their own account they steal a look ahead to see what is the fate of the fascinating fairy princes and princesses who pass through many exciting adventures within the two covers. The book contains many beautiful illustrations, of which eight are reproduced in colors. They are the work of the artist H. J. Ford. Cloth; olive and gold cover. Pp. 336. Price $1.60. Longmans, Green & Co., publishers, New York.

Little Water Folks, by Clarence Hawkes, is one of the most satisfactory nature books that have been published for some time. The author has the rare faculty of making the reader see the wild spots in the quiet country as he himself saw them before he gave his impressions to the printed pages. The reader who has ever lived in the country in his boyhood will enjoy this little collection of tales, as well as those city readers who always regret that they have not had the advantages of a life in the open. Cloth cover; 151 pp. Price, 75 cents. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., publishers, New York City.

Childhood, by Millicent and Githa Somerby, is one of the daintiest gift books of the season to place in the hands of the children on Christmas morning. It is a book filled with catchy little poems written by Githa Somerby. They display more than ordinary ability, and the illustrations by Millicent Somerby are the kind that children love. Some are in colors and are works of art. It is bound in white cloth, stamped in gold, and there are illustrations for nearly all of the forty-four pages. Price $1.50. Duffield & Co., publishers, New York City.

No Death

The following poem has frequently, but erroneously, been credited to Bulwer Lytton. The name of the real author is given below.

THERE is no death. The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore;
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forever more.

There is no death. The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer's showers
To golden grain or mellow fruit
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

There is no death. An angel form
Walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
He bears our best-loved things away,
And then we call them "dead."

J. L. McCREERY.

All Helping the Mission Boat

THE American missionaries at Cebu, in the Philippines, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Jansen, having exhausted their brief furlough in the home land, are now on their way back to their "parish of a hundred islands," happy in the prospect of soon having a mission boat for service in their distant field of labor. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have responded to the appeal for funds to purchase a mission boat for these devoted workers. For several years past the Jansens have been utilizing native canoes in their pastoral work, but as these little vessels at best are slow, frail and unseaworthy, save in the most favorable weather, the missionaries' operations have been greatly hampered in consequence. With a motor-boat, they would be able to do much better service, and to employ their time to far greater advantage than now. It is hoped that the friends of missionary effort in the Philippines will aid this movement with prompt and generous contributions, in order that a boat may be bought and sent to the Cebu station at the earliest practical date.

"When we missionaries are able to visit the little coast towns and islands frequently," said Mr. Jansen before leaving, "and lend their presence to the preaching and work of the native evangelists, persecution in its openly illegal forms will cease, and the people who now live in fear will, please God, feel that the hand of this great nation is ready to be used to protect them in their right to religious liberty.

"In a short time every town and island in our great territory of land and sea can be brought under missionary care. The Mission Boat, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is so earnestly trying to get for us, will soon be on its way for service ready to carry the Gospel to the hundred islands which are now waiting it. We pray that the boat may come soon.

Country Life in Uganda

LIFE in Uganda, Africa, must be made almost too active for pleasure by the swarms of insects that seem to pervade all parts of the thatched houses in which some white people are unfortunate enough to dwell for a short time, according to a writer in the Cornhill Magazine. The windows of our dwelling-house, he writes, were little slits with calico nailed across them instead of glass, but they had four doorways. One door possessed a handle, for one there was no fastener, one had a lock and key and the fourth had no door at all. Every night the occupants, from force of habit probably, would turn the key in the only lock that existed, while at the same time they wondered why they were not separated from their possessions by all the thieves of Uganda.

Eating was not a pleasant affair. The roof of the house was of thatch, in which snakes and rats made their abode, frequently shaking down dirt and pieces of thatch into the food on the table. Whenever it rained, the water poured through in several places, and if the storm came at night it was necessary to sleep with an umbrella up on the bed, and a raincoat over the blankets.

All of these things, however, were but small annoyances compared with the swarms of insects that ran over the house, through the house, and seemed to invest everything it contained from furniture to clothing. "There were insects that sprang, and insects that did not spring; there were ants of revolting outline; there were jiggers that lamed us time without number; there were boring beetles that conscientiously mined out the interior of all serviceable wood till the chairs and tables became hollow shams, tottering to destruction before our eyes. There were little ants which swarmed up to giddy heights in order to fatten on butter; there were big-bodied, gluttonous ants which swelled themselves on sugar eaten in secret, and there were whole empires of white ants, which flourish their tunnels and traceries of red mud in every direction. These were omnivorous and omnipresent. We could hang no pictures, for they ate them. They ate my only waterproof and throve upon it. In my ignorance of their powers I put up a dado of native bark-cloth to hide the marks of their industry in our sitting-room, and while I was down with fever they ate the dado."

When conditions became unbearable the owners removed all of their household belongings into the compound, and then the natives plastered the interior of the house with mud from neighboring barnyards.

"Presumably," says the writer, "the insects perished. I know that I very nearly did."

For a period of fourteen years the Industrial Savings and Loan Co. have been building up their reputation for integrity, conservation and liberality in handling accounts of small investors throughout the country. See their advertisement on Page 1082 and write them for particulars.

The First Christmas

By Mrs. M. Baxter

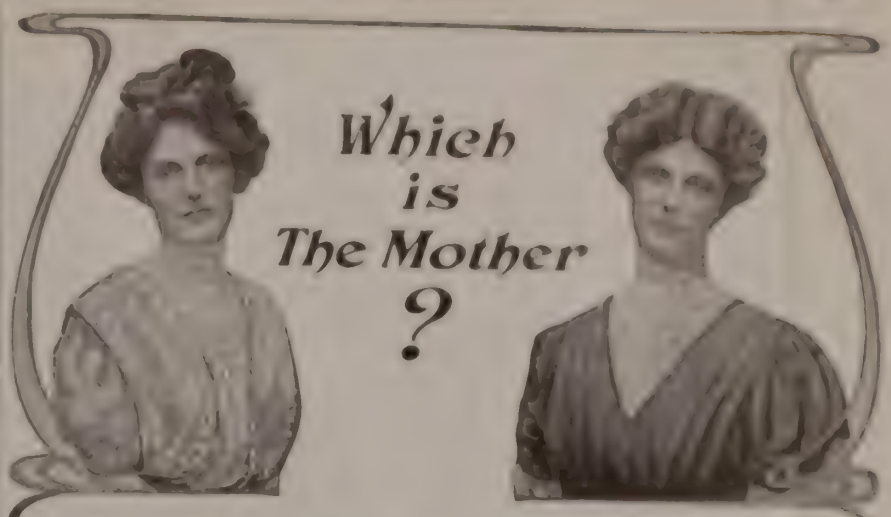
THE tiny company who looked for redemption in Jerusalem at the time of Christ's advent were not staggered by his virgin birth, nor by the poor surroundings of his entrance into this world. Mary, Elizabeth, Zechariah, Simeon, Hannah knew the Scriptures and the power of God. The wisdom of this world had not dimmed their eyes for heavenly glory in earthly humility, and they saw in the babe of Bethlehem the Holy One of God, Israel's and the world's Messiah.

But the great ones of the earth saw everything through the opaque medium of self-interest. And God put them to the proof. No rumor of what had taken place in Bethlehem had reached the rich and noble in Jerusalem. The elders and scribes were all occupied with their own expectations, and with securing to themselves as good a position as could be under the Roman rule to which they were subject. The story of the shepherds of Bethlehem had not penetrated Herod's court. But, in quite another way, God arranged that he should hear of the coming of his Son into the world. He heard that "wise men from the East" had arrived in Jerusalem, inquiring on all hands after the King of the Jews, who was born. No shepherds had gone into their country to tell them. It was from the stars above they read, by Divine inspiration, that Israel's promised King was born, and the event was so great in the eyes of these men of the East that they had come with fitting presents to do honor to him.

Had Herod known the Scriptures, and the power of God, such news would have led him to his knees to ask his way from God. But Herod knew neither God nor His Word; he fell back on the theologians, and "when he had gathered the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ [the Messiah] should be born." Herod knew well enough that the Lord would "raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King should reign and prosper, and execute judgment and justice in the earth," and that "in His days Judah should be saved, and Israel should dwell safely" (Jer. 23: 5, 6); and, alarmed for the safety of his throne, and quite ignoring what was due to God and to his people, the wretched man took measures to discover where the infant Messiah should be born, with the awful intent to murder him.

The chief priests and scribes knew the letter of the Word, and without hesitation answered Herod: "In Bethlehem of Judea, for thus it is written by the prophet, And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Judah, art not the least among the princes of Judah; for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel." Why did not these chief priests and scribes ask to accompany the wise men, whose faith was so strong that they would surely find the Messiah? They took their cue from the king. If they were to go in search of the new-born King, they knew very well it was as much as their lives were worth, and self-interest led them to desist. To them it was more a curious question of opinion whether this Child was really the Christ, and perhaps they looked on the wise men as well-meaning fanatics, and quite ignored that they had any responsibility in the matter.

To the simple, open-hearted shepherds, God would send word from heaven: "Unto you is born a Saviour," but no such direct message was given to those who did not follow the clue God had given them by the wise men. They were wise men who followed God's clue. Herod inquired diligently of the wise men what time the star appeared, and in his hypocrisy said to them: "Go and search diligently for the young Child; and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also."



Daughters: Retain Your Fresh, Youthful Looks.
Mothers: Regain Them, and Look Like Your Daughters

Nature never intended that a woman's beauty should leave her with her youth; it will not if she keeps the skin of her face and neck healthy, the flesh firm, the muscles plastic, and the blood circulation active.

Cosmetics and artificial "beautifiers" are not necessary—they are harmful. All that is required is the natural cleanser and beautifier,

Pompeian Massage Cream

It works with and for nature always; its frequent use restores and maintains the youthful glow of cheek; firm, smooth, unwrinkled skin, full, rounded form.

There is no mystery, no magic about it; the effects of Pompeian Massage Cream are simply based on sound common sense.

These Beautiful Instruments are the result of many years' experience in the manufacture of organs, and are confidently offered to the public. These musical wonders use no paper, but music is obtained from a roller furnished with pins. These pins operate upon valve keys, made of hard steel. All the working parts of the instrument are easily accessible, and are made of solid metal, the rollers and keys being mounted on metal castings. Nothing has been omitted to give these grand instruments their crowning qualities of extreme simplicity and durability. There is no limit to either kind or quality of music. They will play Hymns and Popular Airs, with a clearness and accuracy, and degree of execution which but few performers can equal. A mere child can play them. They have the carrying quality of a Large Pipe Organ, and are the only instruments that will render slow and sacred music with a powerful, sustaining organ tone. They will play tunes as long as desired, without any break, instead of stopping to change the piece, as must be done with organettes. They are beautifully finished in solid walnut. The reeds are organ size, and the volume of tone will fill a hall. They are Genuine Musical Instruments, which anyone can play, without teacher or practice, and which good musicians can recommend. The price is nothing compared with their intrinsic value. They are equal in every way to a $50 Music Box, so far as the quality of the music is concerned, and also in point of construction, finish, and decoration. This organ is the most simple, perfect, marvelous, instructive, enjoyable, and amusing musical instrument in the world. FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, it is just what is wanted. It will play all the sacred music, and as many verses as desired, without stopping to replace the music roller. This great advantage no other instrument has. By this means, a result is attained that was never reached before.

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at a price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a very much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which have been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete List will be mailed on application.

A Low-caste Native Girl

A Parsee Girl of Bombay

LITTLE GENDA, THE CHILD-BRIDE

A True Story of Girlhood, Wifehood and Widowhood in India

LITTLE Genda ("Marigold"), dressed in bridal array, with her playmates around her, formed a pretty picture. Too young and innocent to fear the future, she was happy in the present, with its lovely clothes, jewels, glitter, and show. Of a high-caste, well-to-do Hindu family, the arrangements for her wedding were of the grandest.

Having several sons, this, their youngest child, although a girl, was dearly loved by her parents. Nothing was too good for their pet. Fate had been propitious in giving them a son-in-law their equal in birth and wealth. He was a clever young student. The marriage went off without a hitch. The Brahmans had read the day and hour, the wedding rites and ceremonies were over, and now the time had come when little eleven-year-old Genda must leave her mother's arms, and go to a mother-in-law's care. At the exact moment as told by the stars she must go. Poor little bride! But a little before all was joy and pleasure; now weeping and wailing. To the old nurse who was to accompany her the precious charge was given over.

Genda gone, the scene changes: where there had been dancing and feasting, there is now a hush, except for the pitiful cries of the disconsolate mother. Her friends try to comfort her by dilating on the grandeur of Genda's prospects, and that she will soon come back. So young a child returns after a short time, and does not again leave the parental roof till she is thirteen years of age.

Although the mother's vanity is touched at being told that even rajas' (kings) weddings are not much grander, yet the heart-ache is there. A few weeks later and once again she holds her darling to her breast—the same and yet not the same. Her little bird is back in the home nest; yet there is a difference. The mother-in-law has been very kind, and Genda has had a happy time. Her boy-husband she has not seen. A bride does not see her husband when she first goes to her married home. Two years pass, and once again Genda leaves her home; but this time it is for good. Her home will now be with her husband's people. There are many superstitions attendant on a young wife's returning to her parental home. It is years sometimes before she is permitted a visit. While Genda had no work to do, or hard tasks to perform, yet life for her was now very different. The petty jealousies of her sister-in-law, the iron rule of the mother-in-law, all made life very hard for the sweet, gentle child. She had now no one to run to with her childish troubles. Many a bitter tear did she shed over a pet doll snatched away by an older girl. Her husband, even had he wished, could not have helped her or interfered.

But Genda had one great comfort and pleasure. A missionary lady used to visit there, and, with others, Genda was permitted to take lessons from her and listen to the Bible-readings. Being intelligent, she soon learned to read, and so whiled away many a sad hour. This lady was drawn to the little one, whose beautiful eyes looked into her face with such longing and interest. The lady tried to impress upon her the power of prayer, how in every trial she should look to God and seek his help.

Genda, the Little Girl-Wife

A little over a year passed away, and Genda was becoming more reconciled to her life, when one sad day her boy husband was brought home ill from college, where he was a student and went daily. In a few hours the darkest cloud that can shadow a Hindu girl's life enveloped her - she was left a widow!

The women of her husband's family rigorously carried out the rules of their caste. Poor Genda was shorn of her beautiful hair, deprived of all her ornaments, and given a white sarki to wear (a lot of coarse white cloth wound round the body). For a few months, till her baby was born, she was permitted the usual meals, but after that, only one meal a day. Looked upon as unlucky, and the cause of their sorrow, not a word of comfort was hers.

The missionary lady came with deep sympathy, but was told that listening to and learning of her had brought this punishment on the family; so she must not come any more. Her heart ached for the poor desolate child—not yet fifteen years of age and with nothing but a dark future before her. The baby, when it came, was a puny, delicate child, yet the girl-mother's heart clung to it; it was something of her own; if it lived, she would one day have a home. The son's home is the mother's, where she reigns, as she never can in her husband's, so long as there is a mother-in-law.

Her child died. Genda's cup of sorrow overflowed. Broken-hearted, with nothing to live for, one still, hot summer's day she sat under a tree by the well in the private yard, thinking of and weeping for her baby boy. No pleasure in the present; no hope in the future—life seemed indeed dreary. The thought came to her: "Why not step into the well and end it all?"

Just then, on the still air, a bird's sweet [illegible] ("Obey thou"). Louder and louder, nearer and nearer, the song rose. It seemed as if the little bird's tiny throat would burst with the volume of sound.

Genda listened, entranced and astonished. "Only obey, O God?" she cried. "Just obey you and leave all the trouble? Help me; take me to [illegible], to my friend. The lady said that thou wast a [illegible]. God. Oh, take me!"

They found her by the well, [illegible]. But the broken heart was healed. Leaving the world, she had taken its flight. The [illegible] had [illegible] the number of young widows sacrificed to custom in India.

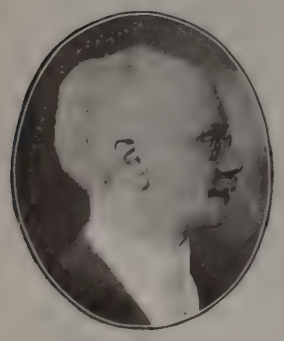
ELOQUENCE AT THE Y.M.C.A. CONVENTION

Notable Addresses at the Recent International Gathering in Washington

By G. A. WARBURTON

WASHINGTON is a city of sight-seeing quite as much as the seat of a great government. Automobiles convey armies of people from one notable place to another, while the megaphone man shouts his stereotyped story. Though Congress was not in session, a visitor to the capital city between Thursday, November 21, and Tuesday, the 26th, might have witnessed an unusual and notable attraction, even in that place where there are so many things well worth the visitor's attention. It was a gathering of more than two thousand men attending the Thirty-sixth International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations of North America. They came from the big cities of the United States and Canada. They represented hundreds of thousands in the membership of the North American Associations.

E. W. Hearne
General Secretary



W. D. Murray
Vice-Chairman

Lucien C. Warner

Men of affairs, who had been successful in business and had given largely of their means to erect buildings for the young men of their communities, sat beside youths hardly out of their teens. I saw officers of big railroad companies, men high in the financial world, a president of an insurance company, and by them engineers who run their trains under the direction of Jesus Christ, and conductors who punch the duplex, mindful of the verse, "Thou God seest me"—small need of detectives with such! Then the country boy was there with all his awkward ways, but with warmth of heart and soundness of moral purpose. He stood for the multitudes behind him in the rural districts, the hamlets, the villages and the small towns. In spite of the vast influx of young men to the city the country boy outnumbers his city cousin and must always be a large factor in our American life. The soldiers and sailors of the United States were there to tell the story of the Association's success among them—hardly a ship without its little nucleus of members, and at all the navy yards the open door of a Christian home to welcome them. Men from the colleges brought their enthusiasm, singing Gospel hymns with the same fervor that they do college songs. Then the representatives of foreign lands—Japan, China, Panama, Russia, Great Britain, India, the continent of Europe—each speaking of the Association's success and full of confidence for the days to come.

A man could hardly see such a gathering and come away with anything but the most confident, exuberant, Christian optimism. This mass of virile, red-blooded, sane, enthusiastic manhood could not but make an impression upon any thoughtful observer. The daily meetings filled the hall of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and the evening sessions crowded the great Convention Hall, the largest meeting-place in Washington.

The Honorable James Bryce made the first notable address. He is not a large man, but his keen face, erect form, vigor of utterance, as well as his recognized position as the authority on American life, made his message most welcome. Here is a pregnant sentence from his lips:

A sense of unity, a desire to dwell upon and promote unity, is now in the ascendant. If in the past days men had remembered that the life is a test of faith, how much sooner would we have reached the sense of unity! It is a hopeful sign of our times that all minor differences between Christians, in strife over which so much zeal and energy were spent to so little purpose, have now fallen into the background. This is a truth which this Association has grasped. It lays hold of essentials. It includes men of all religious persuasions. It seeks to apply Christianity to life, and to make its results appear in life. In the Christian life there is room for meditation, room for those who study and teach theology, both philosophically and historically. But for all of us the main thing is the application of our beliefs to our actions. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

He declared that a conspicuous merit of the Association is that it is meeting one of the great needs of the age—the care of the vast and incessant outflow of young men from their rural homes who go to try their fortunes in the cities.

How many a youthful stranger, lonely and sad in the harsh streets of a great city, has sighed for sympathy and counsel? How many have succumbed to temptations because the plant stood alone and unsheltered, when its stem was yet too weak and tender? This Association, with its branches in every city, stands ready to welcome every newcomer who seeks to base his life upon its faith and hope. It cheers him, it opens to him means of raising his own thoughts by communing with others more experienced or advanced than himself, and it gives him facilities for useful work in trying to serve his fellow men.

He said that what holds true in regard to the work of the Young Men's Christian Association also holds true in regard to politics.

You can help your country no less in a public than in a private way. You can reflect upon and try to understand the questions that are before the country, inform yourself and think for yourself, not putting your conscience in any one else's keeping. You can, when you find that you have something worth saying, address your countrymen in writing or speech. You can vote. It is as much the duty of a Christian citizen to vote according to his sense of right as it is to use just weights and measures. It is a common saying that every vote counts, but, what is far more, every wise word counts, every upright life counts.

How different would America and England be to-day—how much less strife, suffering and sadness would there be, if they were pervaded and guided by the spirit of the Gospel! To bring this nearer, even if only a little nearer, is in the power of each and every one of you by the ordering of his life according to that spirit.

Rev. Dr. Parkhurst

The Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst spoke upon "The Divine Element in Character Building." It was brilliant like the skies at night in which shine innumerable stars. Let me give a few phrases:

Religion may be conceived of as being either a fund of sentiment, a system of thought, a scheme of service, or a reservoir of power.

Sentiment is like a blossom in this respect, that it retains its vitality and beauty only so long as it remains attached to some parent stock. Nourished by superior force it is what we might designate a low-pressure means of meeting the world's necessities.

Every man has a theology, he said; that is, if he has had any religious experience, and is intelligent enough to translate that experience into terms of thought. Theology, if genuine, is simply a deposit that is left by experience; the dregs at the bottom of the bottle. It concerns itself, of course, with religious matter, but has in it no more of the vital genius of religion than has astronomy or geology. It is religion viewed speculatively instead of appropriated experimentally. Religious experience is bound to produce theology, but theology is incompetent to yield religious experience. As a branch of theology it is admirable; as a substitute for religion it is abominable, and is no more like religion than the pressed flowers in an herbarium are like the fragrance of a clover field, or the blossoms of a rose garden. And to be thoroughly versed in all the best theology that was ever produced would in itself lift me no nearer heaven than to be thoroughly schooled in all the truest astronomy that ever has been written would lift me nearer the planet Jupiter or the distant star Alcyone.

There is so much of the idea of service involved in an organization like yours that this third matter requires to be handled with very special care and frankness. And so I undertake to say that service is not religion any more than theology is. It may be symptomatic of religion; it may be a product of religion; it may be a means of making religion effective. But considered in itself it is simply performance, and when you have added up a whole column of performance there is not necessarily any religion in the footings.

Here are a few of Parkhurst's unattached gems. Speaking of the need of vital experience of religion, he said:

Second-hand goods are cheap.

There is only one antidote to doubt, and that is experience.

The law of religion is the law of the inner life. We can scour our virtues without aid, and pull a few weeds out of our gardens, but only as God touches our souls can we grow in grace.

It takes a good deal of God to make a man; he is not a man until he is a great deal more than a man.

When William Jennings Bryan was introduced by Secretary of the Treasury Cortelyou it was easily discovered that the enthusiasm of the delegates had reached a high pitch. The remarks of the Secretary were cordial and felicitous. He spoke of his personal interest in what the Association was doing and emphasized the value of character in our national life.

HONORS TO A HEROINE

AN unusual honor has been conferred on the world's most famous war nurse, Florence Nightingale, by King Edward VII. of Great Britain. On November 29 he sent her by special messenger the badge of the Order of Merit, and the certificate of membership in the Order. It is one of the most coveted distinctions within the gift of the British sovereign. There can only be twenty-four members, and these have been the most distinguished soldiers and statesmen. Miss Nightingale is the first woman on whom the honor has been conferred. Congratulations were sent from all parts of Great Britain and from people in America who regard Miss Nightingale as one of the foremost workers for humanity. She was the first trained nurse to follow an army into battle, to care for the wounded and comfort the dying.

Miss Nightingale was born to a life of luxury and ease. Her father was a wealthy landowner and his daughter received all of the advantages of education and extensive travel, but she was not satisfied not to do something for those that were ill and suffering. Her sympathy extended to dumb animals, and the story is told that when she was a little girl she tended for several days a shepherd dog that had injured its leg.

She studied scientific nursing in Germany, and when the war in the Crimea started she volunteered for service at the front. Her services were accepted, though many stood aghast at a woman doing such an unheard-of thing.

She organized a corps of over thirty nurses and established her hospital at Scutari. Here her services were of great value.

It was on the same day as the battle of Inkerman was fought that Miss Nightingale landed at Scutari, and she and her party were immediately comfortably lodged and provided for. In the afternoon we hear of some of them making their appearance on the shore, "cheerful and pleasant, neatly attired in black, a strong contrast to the usual aspect of hospital attendants, and oh, how welcome!"

They came none too soon, for in the course of the next few days six hundred wounded were brought in from Inkerman. The surgeons, even the most prejudiced, could but confess that Miss Nightingale was the right woman in the right place. Her nerve was simply wonderful; her quiet systematic way of going to work and organizing everything necessary for the care of the sick and wounded, inspired the clergy and medical men with a feeling of security. They had some one now to depend upon, and would from henceforth be spared the terrible sight of men sinking for want of proper nursing, and because food was not administered often enough. With the nurses, all that was needed was supplied. One poor fellow burst into tears, exclaiming, "I can't help it, I can't indeed, when I see them. Only think of English women coming out here to nurse us; it is so homelike and comfortable."

"At the Barrack Hospital there is hardly a single second class staff officer left," came one report from the front. "Dr. Summers is very ill, and Dr. Nourse, I regret to say, is dead. Like poor Struthers, he too has fallen, an untimely victim to the zeal with which he discharged his professional duties. It was fever of a low type in his case also; and, indeed, it is so rife now in every direction, that the wonder is how more of the healthy and strong are not struck down by it. Both Newton and Struthers, it may be a consolation to their friends to know, were tended in their last moments and their eyes closed by Miss Nightingale herself."

Florence Nightingale

What greater praise could be given to any woman than that it "must necessarily be a comfort" to the mourners that she should close the eyes of their beloved? The aching mother's or wife's heart, wrung with anguish, was soothed by the thought that the place they would so gladly have occupied was not quite desolate, and that the departing souls went home with a woman's voice whispering a prayer, a woman's hand to

A SERMON BY

Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

The Bargain Counter

Heb. 12: 14—"Wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees"

HOW the ways of doing business have changed within the last fifty years! When our grandfathers lived the land was sparsely settled. Then every man willing to work could find plenty of work to do. Then the universal motto was, "Never build upon another man's foundation. Never try to undermine the work of your neighbors." If a man had a little country store, no one ever thought of building another store just across the street, to split his trade in half. It was a universally recognized truth that there was only room enough for one store in a village, and the first man who started a store had a personal right to that trade and no one else dared say him nay.

If another man started a blacksmith shop in a village, he had a monopoly of his line of business in that region. A neighbor had the right to start a blacksmith shop ten miles away, but not another in that locality. What was true of the blacksmith was also true of the miller and the cobbler and the physician and the lawyer. Then the harvest had so few laborers that no man tried to build up his success upon the ruin of another's life. But now all things have changed. Instead of trade hunting the man, the man has to hunt his trade. Whereas, in olden times, there were a dozen different places for each man, now there are a dozen different applicants for each place. Thus men to-day seem to win their success by crushing out the lives of their fellow men. And this fact is especially true in the mercantile world. Each year the margin of profits is being cut down. The merchant who can buy the closest and sell the cheapest, is the man who builds up the biggest trade and has the largest store.

Cruel Competition

This competition for trade has become so bitter that the merchants, in order to underbid each other, have said to their partners, "We will take some goods and mark them down below cost. These we will put upon the bargain counter. Then, after the people have flocked to this bargain counter, perhaps we can sell them some other goods that will reimburse us for our direct loss." Thus almost every day you can see some advertisements in the newspapers which tell you that at such and such store at certain times such and such goods will be sold at a price below cost. When you read these reductions, you know that these goods could not be made for such a selling price. And yet, there is a large class of people who daily scan the newspaper columns for the bargain sales. These buyers go from bargain counter to bargain counter, and then come home gloating over the fact that they had purchased those goods cheaper than they could have been made.

Now, this is a sad commentary upon the social conditions of modern life. Whenever a man or a woman buys an article cheaper than it cost to produce that article, some one has to suffer. There is no exception to the rule. To-day, I would use for my sermonic theme, "The Tragedy of the Bargain Counter," and the lessons it teaches.

In the first place, the great throngs pushing and jostling about the bargain counter impress me with the thought that for the great masses of people life is a terrific financial struggle. From morning until night, and from night until morning, the vital question uppermost in most people's minds is how they can make their income equal their outgo. The children must have shoes and dresses and underwear. The house-servant must be paid. Food must be provided for the table. Medicines must be bought. School bills must be met. Yet the salary cannot be made any bigger. Now, what is the average man to do? He must cut down his expenses. And in every way in which those expenses can be cut down, people do it. This is one of the great reasons of the multitudes flocking about the bargain counters.

Straitness in the Home

You do not believe this? Well, perhaps the dollar question is not a vital question in your family. You have made a financial success and your home is on Easy Street. But is your memory so short-lived that you cannot remember the experiences of your old father's house? Money was not as plentiful then as it is now. Then, every dollar had to be made to do its full stint of work. Then, there was no waste and no foolish buying. Do you not remember how your mother used to go shopping day after day? How tired she would look when she came home! And the strange fact was, she would so often come home empty-handed. Your father would come in for supper and say, "Well, mother, what did you accomplish to-day?" and with a tired voice she would answer, "Nothing, John; nothing. I do not know what I shall do. The two girls must have new coats. Then the boys need warm underwear. I must get another set of warm blankets for Jennie's bed. Everything is so high! Of course, it would be easy enough to shop, if we had plenty of money; but we haven't, and the clothing must be bought, and how to buy it is the question. Well, I will try again to-morrow and see what I can do." Then your father said, "Too bad, Mary. Too bad! I hate to see you look so tired. But perhaps, when we pay off the mortgage, you will have a little money to spend, and then you can hire a girl for the kitchen and for the scouring." Do you not remember such a discussion in the old home? Well, there are thousands and tens of thousands of homes in the city like your father's home. There are plenty of babies in those homes, and but little money to provide for them. Buying for such families is no joke. The expenses must be cut down, and that is one reason the bargain counters have the struggling multitudes about them.

Feeding on Wreckage

But the bargain counter teaches us another lesson. Though most people are having a hard time financially, there are a great number who fatten themselves upon the misfortunes of others. These modern vandals or ghouls of the night are not producers or developers; they are human beasts of prey, whose business in life is to find some victims in distress, and then to pounce upon them and make profit out of their misfortunes. They are like the wreckers of old who used to patrol the western coast of England. When a merchant ship was approaching the coast, they would, with false lights, decoy it upon the rocks; then they would gather up the wreckage and take the plunder to their homes and sell it. So from time immemorial men have increased their own fortunes by living upon the wreckages and the shipwrecks of other lives. The tragedy of our last national panic proves that what I say is true.

During the financial stringency in October, there were certain men in New York City who had ready money. Some of these men began to run up their premiums twenty and fifty and seventy-five and even a hundred per cent. In other words, in order to borrow ten dollars from you, I would have to give twenty dollars in return. Because these men had cornered the money market, they attempted to take from their fellow men every dollar they possessed. These plunderers were fattening their purses upon the misfortunes of their fellow men. And had not the Secretary of the Treasury, and men like J. P. Morgan and others of that ilk, brought millions upon millions of dollars into Wall Street, this country would have seen the darkest days in its financial history. Alas, Wall Street is no different from every other street! In every country there are a lot of human vultures. Like haunting spectres they are hovering around ready to banquet upon the carcasses of the financially slain. As soon as any man gets into trouble, they pounce upon him and rip and tear him to little pieces. Like the ghouls of the night, they live by desecrating the graveyards. Like the robbers of stranded ships, their incomes are derived from the wreckages of their fellow men.

The Unknown Sufferers

Now my brother, if you have a good income and are not in abject want, be morally and spiritually honest. As you expect men to pay you a just price for your labor, you should be willing to pay others a just price for their labor. Because a poor seamstress is unfortunate and cannot get work, do not give her seventy-five cents a day for her services, when you ought to pay her a dollar and a half. If you have an industrious boy in your employ who is doing the work of a full-grown man, do not pay him simply the wages of a boy. Pay him the wages of a man. Because you have a merchant in a financial "hole," do not squeeze the life out of him. Be honest. Be fair. Pay a just price for all labor. That is, pay as you expect others to pay you.

The tragedy of the bargain counter teaches us another great lesson. When an article has to be sold below cost, the unseen sufferers are those who are hurt the worst by the financial sacrifice. The clerk who sells you the goods over the counter may not be the sufferer. Neither is the man who is at the head of the great dry-goods emporium the one who ought to be the most pitied. But the unseen sufferers are the men and women whose names you never knew, and whose faces you never saw. These are the people who should be commiserated.

The tragedy of the bargain counter is like the tragedy of the late Civil War. I have been over many of the great battlefields of our country. Perhaps you have also been to some of them. Then, like me, you have stood before the plain white tombstones in our national cemeteries and said, "Poor fellows! Poor fellows! Most of these martyred soldiers were only boys. Think of the long marches and the days of hunger and cold. Think of those soldiers falling in the awful charges and the despair that must have overwhelmed them when they fell. Think of the horrors of the operating table and their agony when dying." But though no man honors the dead soldiers of the late Civil War more than I do, yet I would tell you that those who died for their country did not make the greatest sacrifices. A living sorrow is a far heavier burden to bear than a dead triumph. Did you ever stop to think of what became of the wives and the mothers and the children of those dead soldiers, when the breadwinners were stricken down? Did you ever think of the soldiers whose health and strength were destroyed, discharged from service, because they were unfit for further duty, and who came home with mangled limbs, doomed to a lifetime of physical decrepitude and pain? Ah, these were the greatest sufferers of the national carnage. Not the men who felt the tingling of the bullet, and then with a cry of, "Oh, my God, I'm shot!" fell dead. The greatest sufferers of a nation's wars are the unseen sufferers.

Martyrs of the Struggle

Who, then, are these martyrs of the bargain counter? I will tell you: In all probability, those goods which are sold belonged to some smaller dealer, who was driven to the wall, and who had to sell his stock for anything he could get. Or they are the goods of some poor woman who had to work in the Chicago or the New York sweat-shops. Or they are the goods that have been marked down below cost in order to run some rival out of business. It is easy enough for a druggist to take in a line of stationery and sell it at cost, in order to destroy the trade of the stationery store near him; but that sale means blood-money. No man ever bought something for less than cost unless some one had to suffer. God pity the poor sewing-girls, whose needles made those cheap garments! God pity the wrecked businesses out of which those bargain counters have been lifted! God pity the men and the women, who for years have had to labor, and yet all their labor go for naught! Do you and I want to make a profit out of such tragedies?

But though it is hard to starve and to wear ragged clothes and go to the poor-house, yet there are even worse results from the bargain counter than those. Poverty is hard enough. But though poverty dresses in rags, poverty too often has a handmaid ready to run at her beck and call. Poverty's handmaid is crime, and crime's name can be spelt in many different ways. Sometimes it is called immorality; sometimes theft; sometimes drunkenness; sometimes forgery; sometimes wrecked and dismantled homes. It is easy enough for some of us to be good when we have full stomachs and are sitting with our dear ones before the grate in the cheerful library; but it is another thing for some of us to be good when we are hungry and cold, and are hearing our little ones cry for their daily bread. Yes, the bargain counter nearly always means poverty. And alas, poverty too often means crime.

The history of the bargain counter is ruinous everywhere. It means poverty, and poverty too often means crime. See that young girl leading a life of shame. The bargain counter may have made her do it. See that forger behind iron bars. The bargain counter may have made him dip the false pen into the ink. See that drunkard. The bargain counter may have lifted the intoxicating cup to his lips. You cannot buy something for less than cost unless some one is being pushed to the financial wall. The bargain counter always means pecuniary loss somewhere, and the loser is driven by poverty and crime to take the cup of despair and drink it to the bitter dregs.

Arm the Children

Now, there are two great practical applications of this subject. Never let your children become the victims of the bargain counter's tyrannies. Never start your own loved ones forth into the battle of life, unless they are mentally and physically trained to do one thing well, so that by their own skill they are able to earn a decent living. The direct cause of the bargain counter is that this world is flooded with unskilled labor. Those unskilled laborers are almost entirely at the mercy of the unscrupulous, who say to the poor needle

GAVE HIS BLOOD TO SAVE A LIFE

AN opportunity to save a life at the cost of personal risk and suffering came unexpectedly to a Brooklyn pastor recently. One of the beds of the Bushwick Hospital has been occupied for several months by Mrs. Ladson, who has been under treatment for an injury to her knee. The surgeons had resorted to various means of relieving her suffering, but without avail. One of her Christian friends, who was deeply concerned about her, is a member of the Bushwick Avenue Congregational Church, of which Dr. John Lewis Clark is pastor. She told Dr. Clark the story of Mrs. Ladson's sufferings, and suggested his praying with her when next he visited the hospital. Dr. Clark complied, and was glad to find that his visit had a tranquillizing effect. He read the New Testament to her and prayed with her, and she seemed to gain new courage and stronger faith as she listened.

A few days later there was a call on Dr. Clark's telephone from the sufferer's husband. He was at the hospital and in great distress. He said that the doctors had decided as a last resource to amputate the diseased limb, and the operation would begin in an hour; he added that his wife feared for her life and begged that Dr. Clark would come and pray with her before the operation took place. Dr. Clark hurried to the hospital and prayed earnestly that the patient might receive divine support in her trial, and that, if consistent with God's will, she might recover. He told her for her encouragement that he would go at once to some of her Christian friends who lived near and ask them to pray for her while the operation was in progress. He found them and they readily consented. Then he returned to the hospital.

He was sorry to see from the faces of the doctors, that some hitch had occurred. They told him that the patient was in so low a condition that there was a strong probability of her sinking after the operation. They had foreseen this danger, but as the necessity for amputation was urgent, it had been decided not to postpone it, but to strengthen the patient by the introduction of strong, healthy blood into her veins during the operation. Her husband had offered himself, but [illegible] blood was [illegible] and prayed as they had prompted the idea it was of God's own initiative. His heart was [illegible] and they took it definitely. The nurse [illegible] was prepared immediately to have him [illegible] [illegible], but without the new blood there was [illegible] chance for [illegible] that it would succeed.

Instantly, as if by revelation, the call to a sacrifice and practical help unfolded in the pastor's mind. It seemed as clear as to the stricken husband. He was [illegible] ideal subject for the transfusion, being young and [illegible] cross. Only this morning he had talked to the sufferer of faith and Christian courage and of how even [illegible] pain and death that we might have. He professed to be a follower of Christ, and it appeared [illegible] him that he could not consistently shrink from suffering when he might save a life. A man [illegible] in such circumstances will be quite certain quickly as the duty is to be done at all. He prepared [illegible] himself, and the doctors having warned him that there might be danger to himself, accepted him.

The pastor was laid on an operating table adjoining that on which the patient lay, his right arm [illegible] was bound to hers, an incision was made in his wrist and he felt the life blood passing from his body. It was a painful sensation, but he bore it until the operation was finished. Then he was raised and the severed artery in his wrist was tied and his arm bandaged. To his great delight he learned that the patient was better than the doctors had expected, and she has continued to make progress since. Dr. Clark is [illegible] that in that moment of trial, when there was need for a practical evidence of faith, courage was given him to follow in the steps of the Master, and grace of his strength to save another from death.

woman, "Make these shirts at so much a day—or starve"; and there is no redress. The unskilled workmen have to labor at starvation wages. The goods mostly found upon the bargain counter are the products of such labor. Never let your children grow up to join the pathetic army of unskilled laborers. Make them learn to do well some one thing by which they can earn an honest livelihood, if there should ever be a necessity for it. And this warning applies just as much to what you shall do for your girls as for your boys.

"Oh," but you say, "you do not know who I am. I am not a pauper. I am one of the leading business men in this town. When I die, I expect to leave my children enough money to be independent. Why, my wife would feel disgraced, if I sent my daughters out to work." Great mistake that, my brother. The money you have saved will never make your family independent of financial risks. The easiest thing in the world to scatter is a fortune, when it is gathered by the hands of another man. And I want to tell you something else. The labor market to-day is simply glutted with the unskilled labor of the men and women who were once denizens of wealthy homes. Your daughter may know how to drum upon the piano from now until doomsday, or paint upon some china a few flowers which her teacher has drawn for her, but such accomplishments in coming days of financial stress will not gain for her her daily bread. No man, I care not who he may be, whether he lives in palace or in hut, has done his full duty to his children, unless he gives his boys and girls the best education in his power and teaches them how to become skilled workmen in some line so that they can earn their daily bread. When I have trained my children's brains and hands to earn a living, I have given them the best boon on earth, next to introducing them to my Saviour and King.

I would impress upon your minds to-day the old Gospel lesson that our mission should be to help those who are helpless, and to care for those who are financially, morally and spiritually tripped up in the battle of life. In the old Roman Coliseum, when a gladiator was flung, the angry foe standing over him had first to look up to the vestal virgins to find out whether he might spare him, or plunge into his heart the fatal sword. If the vestal virgins wanted the prostrate fighter to live, they would point their thumbs to the heavens; if they wanted him to die, they would point their thumbs down. So to-day, by the lessons of the bargain counter, we hold the life and the death of multitudes as they did in the Roman Coliseum. Shall we say, "Thumbs up," or "Thumbs down"?

Oh, the bitterness of the financial struggle of life! Oh, the awful worry men and women have, in order to feed and clothe their dear ones! Oh, the awful sufferings and the heartrending agony of poverty! Have you ever read how the great Earl of Shaftesbury started on his life's work? When he was a schoolboy at Harrow, one day he saw a party of five men carrying a rough pine coffin between them on their way to potter's field. These five men were all intoxicated. While they were staggering and hiccoughing along, suddenly they dropped the pine box and it broke open and the corpse rolled out at young Shaftesbury's feet. "Alas!" said the young schoolboy, "that any one in this world should be so poor and friendless that he has to live as that man lived, and die alone and be buried by a lot of drunken loafers." Then the lad said, "If God lets me live, I shall devote my life to helping those who have not had the same chance that I have had." Well, my brethren, as we see the multitudes struggling by the bargain counters, you and I might make the same resolve that young Shaftesbury made by the broken coffin of the English pauper.

When we see a tired mother working night to earn a few pennies upon her baby's stocking; when we see wives trying to cut down their expenses by buying a cloak or a pair of blankets a little cheaper than they would otherwise have to pay; when we see the great crowds flock to a store, never to spend a few dollars, but know that the most of folks are not doing this for fun. They have to skimp and save because their incomes are so small. They are not only economizing in clothing, but also in food. A large part of the human race, when winter comes, is cold and hungry. And yet we should not think nothing of squandering our money right and left. Oh, why are we not willing to help those who need help! Oh, why are we not, like young Shaftesbury, eager to help those who are helpless? The tragedy at the Bargain Counter should make us all helpful and sympathizers in the struggles of our fellow men.

No sooner did Shaftesbury enter Parliament as a young man, than he at once began to work [illegible] whose he could help. Upon [illegible] and advocated laws for the alleviation of the suffering of the insane in the public asylums. As soon as the pitiful [illegible] of these poor unfortunates were [illegible], he wrote to his diary: "And so, by God's blessing, my first effort has been made for the advancement of human happiness." Next, he advocated laws to better the condition of the poor paupers [illegible] and he wrote in one of our Sunday Talks [illegible] the work [illegible] He succeeded a [illegible] little children who, on [illegible] were [illegible] to work for a living. Then [illegible] and at last [illegible] Parliament. And what he [illegible] the Prince of Wales as well as the [illegible] poor, and with [illegible] good Earl of Shaftesbury's body was laid away [illegible] honored dead of Westminster Abbey. [illegible] philanthropist received [illegible] as he [illegible] by [illegible] Parliament [illegible] May Jesus Christ [illegible] so we may [illegible] both May we, from [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"THIS IS A CHRISTIAN NATION"

Our Highest Courts Hold that Christianity Is Part and Parcel of the Common Law of the Land

IN the course of the present controversy over the action of the Board of Education, relative to the Christmas exercises in the public schools of New York and Brooklyn, the statement has been made repeatedly that "this is not a Christian nation," and that consequently the doctrines of the Christian religion are not entitled to the consideration which the followers of that religion claim.

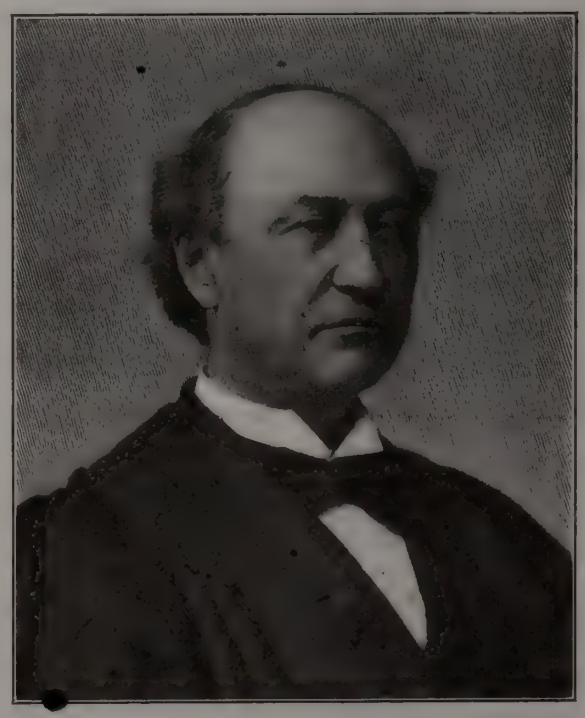
When Bishop Satterlee of Washington, a few days ago, in discussing the New York controversy, declared that ours is a Christian nation, and that the United States Supreme Court had so decided, his statement was received with incredulity in many quarters. Irrespective altogether of any influence such a statement might have on the Board of Education controversy (which has since been settled by the Board renouncing its purpose of interfering with the Christmas celebration), THE CHRISTIAN HERALD decided to make a thorough search of the legal authorities, in order to ascertain and lay before the people the rulings of the highest courts, national and State, defining the legal status of the Christian religion in the United States. The results of that inquiry are given below:

U. S. Supreme Court—In the case of Holy Trinity Church vs. United States (143 U. S. 457), on page 470, will be found the following passage:

"There is no dissonance in these declarations. There is a universal language pervading them all, having one meaning; they affirm and reaffirm that this is a religious nation. These are not individual sayings, declarations of private persons: they are organic utterances; they speak the voice of the entire people. While because of a general recognition of this truth the question has seldom been presented to the courts, yet we find that in Updegraff vs. The Commonwealth (11 S. and R. 364, 400), it was decided that 'Christianity, general Christianity, is, and always has been, a part of the common law of Pennsylvania; . . . not Christianity with an established church, and tithes, and spiritual courts; but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men.' And in The People vs. Ruggles (8 Johns. 290, 294, 295), Chancellor Kent, the great commentator on American law, speaking as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, said: 'The people of this State, in common with the people of this country, profess the general doctrines of Christianity, as the rule of their faith and practice; and to scandalize the author of these doctrines is not only, in a religious point of view, extremely impious, but, even in respect to the obligations due to society, is a gross violation of decency and good order. . . . The free, equal and undisturbed enjoyment of religious opinion,whatever it may be, and free and decent discussions on any religious subject, is granted and secured; but to revile, with malicious and blasphemous contempt, the religion professed by almost the whole community, is an abuse of that right.' Nor are we bound, by any expressions in the Constitution, as some have strangely supposed, either not to punish at all, or to punish indiscriminately, the like attacks upon the religion of Mahomet or of the Grand Lama; and for this plain reason, that the case assumes that we are a Christian people, and the morality of the country is deeply ingrafted upon Christianity, and not upon the doctrines or worship of those impostors.'

"If we pass beyond these matters to a view of American life as expressed by its laws, its business, its customs and its society, we find everywhere a clear recognition of the same truth. Among other matters note the following: The form of oath universally prevailing, concluding with an appeal to the Almighty; the custom of opening sessions of all deliberative bodies and most conventions with prayer; the prefatory words of all wills, 'In the name of God, amen'; the laws respecting the observance of the Sabbath, with the general cessation of all secular business, and the closing of courts, legislatures, and other similar public assemblies on that day; the churches and church organizations which abound in every city, town and hamlet; the multitude of charitable organizations existing everywhere under Christian auspices; the gigantic missionary associations, with general support, and aiming to establish Christian missions in every quarter of the globe. These, and many other matters which might be noticed, and a volume of unofficial declarations add to the mass of organic utterances that this is a Christian nation."

In Andrew vs. N.Y. Bible and Prayer Book Society (4 Sanford, 156) the Superior Court of the City of New York, by Justice Duer, said (on page 182):



Justice David S. Brewer, U. S. Supreme Court

"We are quite aware of the answer that has sometimes been given to this objection. Christianity, it has been asserted, is now, in a modified sense, the religion of the State. It is so as a part of that common law which our ancestors introduced and we have retained. Christianity therefore furnishes the test that is desired, so that in judging of the validity of a use as pious, we have only to inquire whether it is in harmony with the doctrines that Christianity teaches. The maxim that Christianity is part and parcel of the common law has been frequently repeated by judges and text writers, but few have chosen to examine its truth or attempt to explain its meaning. We have, however, the high authority of Lord Mansfield and of his successor, the present Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench (Lord Campbell (Campbell's Lives of Chief Justices, vol. 2, p. 513), for stating as its true and only sense, that the law will not permit the essential truths of revealed religion to be ridiculed and reviled. In other words, that blasphemy is an indictable offense at common law. The truth of the maxim in this very partial and limited sense may be admitted. But if we attempt to extend its application, we shall find ourselves obliged to confess that it is unmeaning or untrue. If Christianity is a municipal law, in the proper sense of the term, as it must be if a part of the common law, every person is liable to be punished by the civil power who refuses to embrace its doctrines and follow its precepts; and if it must be conceded that in this sense the maxim is untrue, it ceases to be intelligible, since a law without a sanction is an absurdity in logic and a nullity in fact."

In Lindenmuller vs. The People (33 Barbour, 548), the General Term of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, First Department, per Allen, J., said (on page 561), "Christianity is not the legal religion of the State, as established by law. If it were, it would be a civil or political institution, which it is not; but this is not inconsistent with the idea that it is in fact, and ever has been, the religion of the people. This fact is everywhere prominent in all our civil and political history, and has been, from the first, recognized and acted upon by the people, as well as by constitutional conventions, by legislatures and by courts of justice."

In Vidal et al. vs. Girard's Executors (2 Howard, 126), the Supreme Court of the United States, by Mr. Justice Story, said on page 198:

"It is also said, and truly, that the Christian religion is a part of the common law of Pennsylvania. But this proposition is to be received with its appropriate qualifications, and in connection with the bill of rights of that State, as found in its constitution of government. The constitution of 1790 (and the like provision will, in substance, be found in the constitution of 1776, and in the existing constitution of 1838), expressly declares, 'That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment or modes of worship.' Language more comprehensive for the complete protection of every variety of religious opinion could scarcely be used; and it must have been intended to extend equally to all sects, whether they believed in Christianity or not, and whether they were Jews or infidels. So that we are compelled to admit that although Christianity be a part of the common law of the State, yet it is so in this qualified sense, that its divine origin and truth are admitted, and therefore it is not to be maliciously and openly reviled and blasphemed against, to the annoyance of believers or the injury of the public. Such was the doctrine of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Updegraff vs. The Commonwealth (11 Serg. and R. Pa., 394)."

The foregoing are the principal cases on the subject, and the decisions from these high authorities are entitled to the respect of all citizens alike, native or foreign-born. Under these interpretations, while the religious freedom of all creeds and denominations is safeguarded, it is made entirely clear that the nation is Christian in its foundation, principles, character and religious development, and that Christianity is part and parcel of the common law, to the extent that its divine origin is recognized, and to blaspheme, ridicule, or revile it is an offense. This recognition, however, is not designed to operate to the disadvantage of other creeds and religions, all of whose followers are entitled under the law to the same freedom and protection in the exercise of their beliefs that Christians enjoy.

SUNDAY SHOWS DECLARED ILLEGAL

FOR some years past, New York has been tending more and more toward what is known as "the European Sunday." Amusements of many kinds have been open on the Lord's day. So-called "sacred concerts"— which were in reality ordinary week-day dramatic, operatic or vaudeville shows, with possibly a hymn by way of prelude or interlude—were to be found in many halls. It is estimated that this species of Sabbath-breaking, which was going on in some fifty theatres, concert halls and other places of amusement, have been attended by an average of 65,000 persons every Sunday.

Now, for a time at least, all this is to be changed, and this particular form of Sabbath desecration will be rigidly suppressed. In the New York Supreme Court, on December 3, Justice O'Gorman handed down what has been described by lawyers as the most drastic and far-reaching ever rendered by a metropolitan court, in which the Justice holds that all Sunday entertainments are violations of the law and must be stopped. Justice O'Gorman says that the controversy involves the construction of Section 1481 of the Charter of the City of New York, which provides as follows:

"It shall not be lawful to exhibit on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, to the public, in any building, garden, grounds, concert room, or other room or place, within the City of New York, any interlude, tragedy, comedy, opera, ballet, play, farce, negro minstrelsy, negro or other dancing, or any other entertainment of the stage, or any part or parts therein, acrobats, or rope dancing."

The Justice quotes many opinions of higher courts and says:

The law is well established in the State of New York that the Christian Sabbath is one of the civil institutions of the State and that for the purpose of protecting the moral and physical well-being of the people and preserving the peace, quiet, and good order of society the Legislature has authority to regulate its observance and prevent its desecration by appropriate legislation."

This decision, which came as the result of an investigation of an uptown theatre, was a tremendous surprise to the theatrical and concert managers. The decision authorizes Police Commissioner Bingham to close every kind of Sunday amusement in New York, from grand opera to negro minstrelsy. It is more than probable that the wealthy Jewish theatrical and concert managers, who practically control the amusement field in New York and several other cities, will make a strong effort to secure legislation this winter modifying the rigid regulations of the city's charter. Under the new ruling, it is claimed, band concerts, club entertainments and even private entertainments where professional singers or players are engaged cannot be given on the Lord's day.

It will put a stop to all suburban Sunday shows, including those of Coney Island, where Sabbath desecration has been tolerated for many years.

IMMIGRATION'S EBB AND FLOW

Servian Gipsies (Excluded)

A Scandinavian Father, Mother and Eleven Children (Admitted)

Roumanian Shepherds (Admitted)

DURING the last few weeks, while the incoming steamers have brought their usual winter number of immigrants to New York by way of Ellis Island, there has been a remarkable holiday exodus of comparatively recent comers. The docks of the Hamburg-American Line, the lines sailing direct to Italy and the Cunard Line have been black with people on sailing days, who were making their way to the gangplanks leading to the steerage. In contrast to the motley dressed throng entering at Ellis Island, these wore good clothes and had an air that showed prosperity. They were men and women who had made some money and were returning for a Christmas holiday at the old home. Some of them had laid by what to their minds seemed a snug little fortune, and were returning to buy a farm or store. Others will return when work in their line becomes more brisk.

November 30, 1907, was an unusual day in the history of steerage travel to Europe. No less than 12,000 aliens left the port of New York on that day, bound for their homes across the sea. For the past few years the custom has been growing for foreigners to return to spend the holiday season, but during the past few weeks such travel has been unprecedented, and this in the face of an increase in steerage rates from $33 to $36 and $37.

Last November, when one of the large steamers belonging to the Hamburg-American Line sailed, she carried but 656 passengers in her steerage. The President Grant, of the same line, which left this port a few weeks ago, carried 3,220 steerage passengers, the greatest number of that class ever booked for one ship.

One man from the Pennsylvania coal mines was heard to say that he did not want to leave this country, but there was no work now at the mines. "I have been here fifteen years," said he, "and have saved a thousand dollars. This will buy a good farm. My friends here," pointing to a group of Slavs, "will do the same."

Nearly 70,000 foreign laborers left our shores during the week ending November 30, 1907, and the twenty-one liners sailing the first week of December have all booked a full list of steerage passengers. Up to the second week in November over 100,000 more of this class sailed for Europe on one line than during the previous year, and on another there was an excess of 15%,000.

All those going home will stay until next spring. Then the tide will again set strongly toward America. Many thousands now sailing from our shores will return to their American homes accompanied by relatives and friends who have long yearned to come to a country where a man not only makes a living, but where he can save enough in a few years to return to his native land and enjoy a vacation. Life is simple and peasants' fare cheap in the old country, and a little hoard goes a long way.

The visitor leaving the dock as the great liner with its crowd of cheering passengers pulls out into midstream, will find much to interest him if he takes the ferryboat and goes to Ellis Island to see the new arrivals. The celerity with which thousands of immigrants are landed, inspected and discharged, going their various ways—North, South, East and West—shows what a remarkably efficient system has been in use in the most important immigrant station in America.

From the first sight of the Statue of Liberty, overlooking the harbor, until he feels the sod of America under his foot, the average immigrant is full of intense interest. Up the walk, past smooth grassy lawns, to the main building goes a strange procession of people, varied in nationality and language, rainbow-hued as to color of dress, but all unmistakably burden-bearers. Backs and shoulders are bent and bowed beneath great bundles, boxes and bags, even little children carrying loads often unsuited to their years.

The long-aisled examination and registry room with its waiting corps of doctors and inspectors is at last reached. One by one the strangers are passed, either to the medical department for further examination, or on down an aisle leading to an inspector's desk. Here questions must be answered satisfactorily; they must tally exactly with the records, or the immigrant finds himself set aside, detained to await investigation by the Board of Special Inquiry.

If all questions are answered satisfactorily the immigrant is shown the way to the railroad waiting-room.

Singly and in groups, families and friends drop their heavy burdens and make a break for the counters where food is sold in big pasteboard packages. Each package is labeled in different languages, describing its contents. Almost invariably a man on opening a package will seize upon the pies—there are four of them in the larger collection neatly piled together—and the facial contortions called forth by an attempt to take through all four layers of pies at once are comical to behold. Often one sees a family like the traditional Irish of stairs, eight, nine, ten, eleven in number, ranging from the grown son or daughter to the babe in arms. The visitor now goes to the department where the undesirables have been "detained."

It is hard to place the blame for the attempts of these unfortunates to enter this country when the immigration laws are so plain and expressly stated. The Act of February 20, 1907, Section 2, says: "All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons and persons who have been insane five years previous" are debarred. To this list is added those likely to become public charges, professional beggars, those afflicted with tuberculosis or other contagious diseases, persons who have been convicted of, or who admit having committed, a felony, polygamists or those who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy, anarchists, and all who come under labor contracts. This law does not exclude those who are usually denominated professional people, actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers, professors of colleges or persons belonging to any recognized learned profession; neither does it apply to personal or domestic servants.

The amount of work done by the inspectors must be seen from the following statement taken from the annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration: At the close of the fiscal year 1906, 1,285,349 aliens had entered the United States during the preceding twelve months, exceeding that of the preceding year by 214,629. The year 1907 produced a record eclipsing all former figures on the subject, 1,100,105 aliens being admitted to our country during that year.

MARY SARGENT HARVEY.

LEADING POINTS IN THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S message at the opening of Congress is a document of some thirty thousand words, and covers a wide variety of topics. In giving his views on the financial question, he protests against the hoarding of money, says the fundamental conditions of business are sound, and that hoarding is the immediate cause of money stringency. As a rule, the business of the country is honestly conducted, and this applies to farms, factories, railroads, banks and legitimate business enterprises. There are exceptions, however, where business men of great sagacity, but unscrupulous and reckless, act without supervision or control, and delude many people into making foolish investments. They have inflicted suffering upon many innocent people. It is not possible, however, to refrain from punishing such offenders, because others must suffer. He believes in "unflinching perseverance in the war against successful dishonesty."

He advocates a more elastic currency. Provision should be made for an emergency issue subject to rigid examination by the national authorities, and based on adequate security.

"It is worth investigating," he says, "to determine whether officers and directors of national banks should ever be allowed to loan to themselves. Trust companies should be subject to the same supervision as banks."

The message states that the tariff should not be changed in the year preceding a general election. The country is definitely committed to the protective system, and any effort to uproot it would cause widespread industrial disaster. He believes in a periodical revision of the tariff as necessities arise. He adds that there should be no tariff on any forest product, and especially there should be no tariff on wood pulp, and no duty on Canadian wood pulp.

The amendment of the Sherman anti-trust law is recommended, and the message advocates conferring on the national government greater power of supervision of business concerns. The message recommends a national incorporation law, licensing railroad companies to engage in interstate business upon certain conditions, and giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to pass upon future issues of railroad securities and to make a "physical valuation" of any railroad. Additional legislation is also recommended looking to the proper control of great business concerns engaged in interstate commerce.

The President recognizes that trade combinations are an inevitable result of modern industrial conditions, which, properly managed, may be a source of good and not of evil. The government, he declares, is not hostile to legitimate business combinations. Honest corporations should be protected and fostered and promoted. There should be a check upon over-capitalization. The affairs of trusts should have greater publicity.

Another suggestion in the Message is that Congress should provide by appropriation a fund to pay the legitimate expenses of [illegible]

The strengthening of the navy, by the construction of four new battleships of the latest type and a number of new torpedo boats is also advocated. Our coast defenses should also be improved and strengthened. The navy needs more men and better pay.

An inheritance tax, such as the House has more than once strongly urged by the President, also endorsed, they should be part of our national system.

Compulsory investigation of strikes, lockouts and other industrial troubles is recommended. The Message favors the establishment of a postal savings bank system.

The Sailing of the Fleet

OUR warships are fairly off on their way to the Pacific. Immediately prior to their sailing, the Admiral of the Navy sent to the officers and men of the fleet a message and a godspeed. "Your mission," he wrote, "is one of peace, and one which is at this time essential to our naval development and preparedness. The loyal spirit of service of the old Navy which you have inherited, and the tireless industry which has organized this splendid fleet, guarantee that it is prepared for any duty and any eventuality."

Among the world's navies, that of the United States now occupies the second place, as far as battleships are concerned, with a tonnage twenty per cent. larger than that of either France or Germany, and over fifty per cent. larger than Japan, which stands fifth in battleship strength. This is pre-eminently the age of battleship construction and our vessels of this class are second to none in the world. But as we are assured on every hand that the cruise of our fleet is a peaceful one, this magnificent display of the greatest naval pageant that has ever flown the American flag, may be rightly regarded as a peaceful armada. Seldom has it happened in the world's history that such a powerful aggregation of fully equipped warships has assembled, save perhaps for some great series of manœuvres, and never for so long a cruise.

Our battleships, torpedo boats and auxiliary vessels, with their total of 15,000 men, will spend the larger part of half a year on their 13,700-mile voyage from ocean to ocean. They carry with them the prayers and best wishes of our people for a safe and pleasant voyage and a speedy return.

Our Esperanto Course

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few weeks hence will appear the first of a Complete Course of Lessons in the new language, Esperanto, which is now attracting the attention of tens of thousands of students of all ages and conditions, throughout the civilized world. It is a language which, in the opinion of leading educators here and abroad, has definitely come to stay.

Our consuls in Europe write urging its general study here, and add that if this country means to keep well abreast in the great educational movement of this age, it must take up Esperanto as the leading European nations are now doing, and make it a popular study, as it is apparently destined to come into general use, for international purposes, in the near future.

It is now taught in many of the schools in Great Britain and on the Continent, under the authority of the school boards. There are eight well-attended public courses taught in London alone, besides others in many smaller English cities. At an examination held lately by the London Chamber of Commerce, 132 candidates were tested in Esperanto, which was thus placed on the same official basis as French, German and Spanish. In Germany, there are countless scattered groups or Esperanto Circles, all affiliated with a National Esperantist Association, and some of the most distinguished Berlin professors are its warmest advocates. The Leipsic Union has officially declared the use of Esperanto as an international auxiliary language "absolutely necessary for the intercommunication of the various nations." In France, there are already many Esperanto publications, and Paris has an Esperanto Club of 3,000 members—the largest in the world. There is a strong and active French National Society for the propagation of the new language. Boulogne, Lyons, and over 100 other cities and towns have clubs and groups of students; and it is proposed to pass a law making Esperanto one of the regular subjects in the public school curriculum. Italy and Austria are also active, and the movement has attained good headway in both countries. Belgium's government announces its intention to introduce it in the public schools of that country. In Spain, there are Esperanto courses in commercial colleges and normal schools, and even in the University of Bilbao. Russia has many circles studying the new language, and in several cities it is taught in the schools. Even the students at St. Petersburg University have organized clubs and are enthusiastically spreading the knowledge of Esperanto. There are study clubs also in far-off Japan, some of them with as many as 600 scholars, adults and youths, and it has been introduced in some of the Japanese schools. In South America, too, the movement has taken root, and in Brazil, Chile and other republics Esperanto clubs are rapidly multiplying.

In our own land, the new language has already students in many colleges throughout the Central States, while Esperanto clubs are springing up in cities, towns and villages. Ohio State University has a large class, and the famous Boston Institute of Technology has classes so numerously attended that they have been a surprise to the faculty. New York has several clubs, and a Brooklyn club has just been organized. But the movement is still in its infancy here.

From these facts, which constitute the merest outline of this great philological movement, it is clear that the new world-language is one to command the earnest consideration of all classes. It is a language easily learned, and the mastery of its general principles is within the reach of every intelligent reader of The Christian Herald. In presenting the course of lessons, it is our purpose to afford to all who wish to avail themselves of it, the double benefit of a simple and attractive mental exercise, and of acquiring a language which may, and in very many cases undoubtedly will, prove a valuable intellectual asset sometime in the future. The Course is free to all, involving no expense to the students. Circles should be formed, with from four to ten or twelve members in each, one student being selected as leader, and a "study period" being definitely set for some afternoon or evening, every other week. For the rest, everything will be explained in the Lessons as they appear fortnightly in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Progress in South America

WITHIN a few years the present books dealing with South America will have to be rewritten if they are to give an accurate idea of anything but the scenery. In other words, revolutions are growing less and the people are getting into step with twentieth century movements, both in an intellectual and material sense. Education is spreading and heroic missionaries are distributing Bibles, though often in the face of great difficulties.

The recent notable peace conference in Washington, at which most of the South American countries were represented, is still fresh in the public mind. Under the guidance of our own Secretary of State work of permanent value was accomplished.

Now comes the interesting news that the wonderful railroad over the peaks of the Andes is almost completed—a herculean task. The road runs from Chile to Argentina, and when a short link is finished the traveler may go from the Atlantic to the Pacific over one of the most stupendous mountain ranges in the world.

With its enormous resources the South American countries have a wonderful future before them, and it is gratifying to learn that the advice of American statesmen has often been followed with good results.

Prevalent Suicide

NOT in many years have the newspapers chronicled so many suicides as during the past few weeks. Not only in what are called the lower classes, where penury and apprehension of starvation are operating causes, but among educated people and people who have abundant means, this disposition to shake off the mortal coil is manifested. Men and women kill themselves without compunction and without any realization of responsibility. The epidemic is significant of the general trend of thought, and is a symptom of prevalent atheism. Death is regarded as the end of trouble, because there is no expectation of a renewal of life. All the promises and warnings of a future life contained in the Bible are ignored.

The suicide thinks, as he steps out of life, if he is capable of thinking at all, that he is going to annihilation. If he conceived it as possible that there is life beyond the grave, he would surely hesitate before seeking in death an end to his trials. If he had but a glimmering of the doubt to which Hamlet gave expression, he would "rather bear the ills he has than fly to others that he knows not of." It is the impression that death ends all that we know of good and ill that is at the base of the impulse to self-destruction. This impression indicates an utter absence of Christian principle, or, in plain words, is atheistic.

Exception must be made to this characterization of every case in which the mind is unbalanced. When a man is crazy he is not responsible for his acts. There have been many suicides which were due directly to insanity, and for these we do not believe God will call the perpetrator to account. He will be judged by his past life, not by the ending of it. This, however, does not apply to the majority of suicides. There is usually too much deliberation, too much care to avoid failure, for the plea of dementia to avail.

The impulse springs sometimes from a fear of long protracted physical suffering, sometimes from a horror of disgrace, more frequently from impatience under a series of disappointments in speculation or in love, a feeling that life can give no further joy, and that death means escape. In every case it is childish and cowardly if reason still maintains its equilibrium. It is the act of one who would cut off his hand if it was hurt, rather than wait for the hurt to heal. Besides being an act of rashness, its chief fault is that it is an act of defiance to God, a challenge to him to exercise his power, and a refusal to bear the burdens that we have brought upon ourselves or which have been laid upon us.

India's Famine Spreading

LETTERS just received from a number of American missionaries in India picture a very gloomy outlook in the Central Provinces. Rev. J. J. Lucas (American Presbyterian Mission), Allahabad, writes to Dr. Klopsch as follows:

The price of every kind of grain and food-stuff is steadily advancing and people are beginning to suffer. The government is making large advances to the farmers to enable them to dig wells, and this is giving labor to a good many. Still there will be tens of thousands unreached and unaided by this means. Especially will the women and children suffer.

Commander Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army in India, writes from Simla to Dr. Klopsch:

We are face to face with a terrible famine. The monsoons have failed over a great part of the country. Prices of grain are already higher than during the last famine, and there seems every reason to believe that we shall have to wrestle with a calamity which is almost without parallel, and which affects some of the fairest provinces in the country. The government is doing its utmost; immense relief works are being planned, and are ready to be started at an early date.

The accounts we have received from our own villages are heart-rending. The prices of grain have gone up enormously even in the districts where there is no expectation of famine; and it seems impossible to buy at any reasonable rates in any large quantities even outside the famine area.

The North India Mission of the Presbyterian Church, at a recent meeting, adopted a resolution which says:

The North India Mission desires to put on record an expression of its appreciation of the generous help it has received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for the support of orphans in their orphanages. Many of these children, saved from death through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund, are now in our schools and churches, some of them giving promise of great usefulness. For all the sympathy and aid given us by Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we are profoundly grateful, and trust, in the famine we are now confronted with, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may once again come to our help in saving life and providing homes for orphans.

KING EDWARD'S TWENTY-FOUR ROYAL GUESTS IN A SINGLE PHOTOGRAPH

ONE of the most remarkable photographs ever taken is reproduced on this page. It represents twenty-four persons, who are either the occupants of thrones or the children of kings. As explained in our issue of November 20, King Edward of England has been entertaining a family party in his ancestral residence at Windsor and wished to preserve a memorial of the illustrious guests. The court photographer was therefore employed to take a photograph of them. There were three kings and five queens in the group, namely, King Edward, Emperor William of Germany and King Alfonso of Spain. There were the wives of the three and the Queens of Norway and Portugal. Included in the group were King Edward's son and his wife, and the Princesses Louise and Victoria, the King's daughters; his brother Arthur, Duke of Connaught, with his wife and son and daughter; the King's sister, Princess Henry of Battenberg, mother of the Queen of Spain, and the little Prince Olaf of Norway, a grandson of King Edward. With them were seven near connections from European courts. During the whole visit the utmost cordiality prevailed and Emperor William took occasion to express his gratification at the welcome accorded him by both court and people. The world's interest in the gathering is more than personal. It has had sad and painful experience of the results which follow royal quarrels and animosities. It has reason to rejoice therefore in the augury this assemblage gives of the amity and good-will existing among the nations represented. It may be hoped that their friendliness may be permanent and that all will strive in their several spheres to deserve the blessing pronounced by the King of kings:

Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God. (Matt. 5 : 9).

New Sayings of Christ

Further discoveries at Oxyrhynchus, in Africa, are announced by Dr. Grenfell and Dr. Hunt, who found the famous Sayings of Christ there a few years ago. This is a vellum fragment of an uncanonical Gospel relating to a conversation on the nature of purity between the Saviour and a Pharisee, supposed to have been held in the Temple at Jerusalem. It is shortly to be published, and is regarded as a valuable addition to the many traditions which were current regarding Christ's teaching during the third and fourth centuries. Every word that Christ uttered is precious, but this is probably only another version of the conversation contained in Matthew 23 : 26-29. The new sayings previously discovered added nothing to our knowledge of him. They only confirmed the statement that John made that there were other things not recorded, but those that were recorded, were sufficient for the purpose sought.

Many other signs did Jesus in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book : but these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life. (John 20 : 30, 31.)

A New Gold Find

Telegrams from Nome, Alaska, report that a new find of gold has been made which promises to rival the Klondike. Two miners have come in from Valdez Creek, a tributary of the Shushitua River, with nuggets valued at about $900 each and quantities of coarse gold dust. They say that there are many prospectors there who have made still larger finds, and that five hundred miners from other camps are now on their way there. The new field is two hundred miles distant from Valdez, but the stampede along the winter trail is now in full tide. A curious feature of the travel is that the snow is covered two inches deep with a fine gritty powder which fell like rain in a recent storm. It was blown in from the sea and was so thick as to render breathing difficult. The ashes have been examined by local scientists and are declared to be volcanic. They are thought to be the result of an eruption from a volcano on the Aleutian Islands, as they resemble the ashes in which Pompeii was buried eighteen centuries ago. Neither this ominous phenomenon nor the perils of a winter journey will deter the gold-seekers from striving to reach the scene of the discovery. Few in these or in former days heed the apostle's warning:

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction. (1. Tim. 6: 9.)

Held by His Foot

A sad ending to a Thanksgiving frolic is reported from a Long Island village. A boy had been out with his schoolmates celebrating the day, and, still wearing his false face and fantastic garments, was plodding homeward for the family dinner. He walked on the Montauk railroad track which was a short cut to his home. In crossing the tracks, his foot slipped, and in an instant it was clutched tightly in a switch frog. Unable to release himself he cried for help. A gate-tender at the crossing was hurrying to his assistance when he heard the rumble of the Amagansett express, and he was powerless to head it off. Retaining his presence of mind, the boy leaned as far off from the track as his imprisoned foot would permit, while the engineer of the express, who had not seen the boy until it was too late, reversed his engine and put on the brakes. The train almost buckled under the sudden stoppage, but the headway was too great to save the boy, and his left foot was cut off above the ankle. The wound was bound up, and he was put aboard the train and taken to the hospital at Long Island City, where the limb was dressed. The child was wise enough to do what he could to save his life when he knew that his foot must be sacrificed. There are some people who have not his wisdom in dealing with their moral difficulties. They are so concerned about the entanglements in which they are held, that they lose the soul itself rather than endure the mutilation that Christ told them to prefer:

It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. Mark 9 : 43

Milton's Bible Sold

An interesting auction sale took place in New York last week. It was of four hundred rare books, which formed part of the collection of a Baltimore diplomat now appointed to a government mission in Spain. Among the books that attracted high bidding was the Bible once owned by John Milton, the author of Paradise Lost. It is a thick quarto volume, covered with old leather and bound with brass mounts and clasp. It was printed in London in 1588 by the Deputies of Christopher Barker. It was thoroughly examined by Dr. W. Aldis Wright of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1904, and pronounced genuine. The fly-leaf bears the signature in the poet's handwriting, "John Milton, February 24, 1654." There is also the signature of Milton's wife, "Elizabeth Milton," on a slip of paper pasted inside the cover. The book appears to have belonged to her before her marriage, for her maiden name, "Elizabeth Mynshull," is written on the leaf between the Old and New Testaments. There are also records of the family and bequests of this very Bible written on the fly-leaves. After a spirited competition it was sold for $1,705. How astonished would Milton have been if some one had told him that his Bible would ever have commanded such a price! If he could know it now, he would tell the eager bidders that his association with the volume was of much greater compared with its intrinsic value.

Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life. (John 5 : 39.)

A Mysterious Fort

A press dispatch from Edmonton, Alberta, tells of the discovery of an ancient fort on the summit of Glacier Lake. It is in the shape of a huge tower, which is now reduced to a height of forty-five feet. It originally had been battlemented when built, but now the battlements have decayed and their ruins are evergrown with woods and grass, which had prevented its character being recognized by miners or tourists. The trenches surrounding it can still be traced, and prove that much care was exercised in their construction. Bones were found around the fort in such quantities that the discoverers were shocked by the spectacle, as they were evidently human skeletons. Those who have seen the fort are unable to venture an opinion as to what race had made it. They are sure the builders were not Russians, as it presents an appearance of age which proves its existence prior to the Russian discovery of Alaska. It is clear that the men of that prehistoric time understood how to build a fort, and the fact of the skeletons lying around it shows that there had been a struggle for its possession, in which many lives had been sacrificed. Of that struggle, and of all involved in it, as well as the cause of the conflict, no record exists. Everything, once so full of interest to those engaged, has perished, and has left no trace but that of the fort with its dead.

The memory of them is forgotten. Your fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live for ever? Or can a man continue a perpetual existence? Job 14 : 2

A Find of Ancient Coins

Excavators at Luxor, in Lower Egypt, have found a number of coins more than two thousand years old. They were found in an earthen jar hidden in the side of an ancient well, where they had been placed for safe keeping twenty-two centuries. These pieces are very thick, and the silver is of great purity. They correspond in weight to the Attic drachm. The obverse bears the head of Minerva in a lion's skin. The reverse shows Zeus seated on a throne, and will bear the name of Alexander the Great. Many interesting antiquities have been found in this land, and some of the events have been recorded in the Bible. Among these are the [illegible] struck. Stamped [illegible] coins, such as the [illegible] plow, a helmet, and so on. [illegible] of the [illegible] by means of [illegible] who may have [illegible]

THE MISCHIEF-MAKERS

"I WONDER whether they will make her organist again when she comes home," replied Dora.

"Make her organist? She won't wait for that. She simply takes possession of the stool as her supreme right. She makes me tired with her presumption in regard to music. I doubt whether she ever took a year's lessons, while I went through Sheldon's Conservatory, and took lessons for two years of Madame Caspari—at two dollars a lesson, too." Some people cannot be taught where they belong, and Kathleen Lawrence is one of them. I wish some of her adorers would marry her, and take her to Kamchatka," Hollis added with a shrug, which more than words revealed her unrepressed jealousy.

The girls talked a little longer over their plans for the proposed entertainment, then Hollis sprang to her feet, saying: "Papa and I are going to take Mr. Allan for a drive this afternoon, to call on some of the people across the river. Papa ordered an early dinner, so I must hurry home."

"Well, good-by, and good luck," cried Dora, as Hollis fluttered away. Left alone she soliloquized: "Of all self-conceited people, Hollis Hayward bears the palm. She thinks she can captivate the new minister, and through his influence rule Hawthorne; but she'll find out that there are others in this town beside herself, and that she is not quite so smart as she thinks she is. It will suit me, though, if she will only flirt with the preacher long enough to disgust Charlie Lester."

Dora seemed to take a sinister pleasure in contemplating the result of her friend's conduct. A shrewd smile played about her lips as she resumed her interrupted duties.

That Hollis Hayward was the unsuspecting innocent that Dora imagined, was far from the truth, as was shown by her meditation as she tripped homeward: "Dora Murray is the queerest girl in Hawthorne," she muttered. "I don't know whether to like her and trust her, or not. She acts smooth enough, dear knows; but now and then she says something so cutting that she makes me suspicious that she is treacherous and underhanded. It is the same way with her talk about Mabel Lawrence. She is sweet as honey to Mabel's face, and one would think they were the dearest friends; but I know better. I am glad that Mr. Allan is to stay at our house, and it will be strange if I cannot manage to keep such people as Dora Murray and Mabel Lawrence and some more of them, from influencing him against me as they did Mr. Andrews. Hawthorne is a poky old place, anyway. I wish papa would let me go to a city where I could have pleasure and privileges worth something. Just because we always have lived here is no reason why we always must. There isn't a soul worth knowing in this community, not even Charlie Lester, for the girl who marries him will have to be tied down to the butter-and-egg existence of a farmer's wife—and may fortune deliver me from that!"

She swung open her home gate vigorously at the thought. Suddenly mind and manner changed, for through the open windows of his room on the first floor, she caught a glimpse of the Rev. Edgar Allan unpacking his books from the boxes which had arrived that morning. She stopped to bend admiringly over her pansy bed, to pick a great bunch of early roses for the dinner-table, to chirp and talk to her canary whose cage hung upon the porch, conscious all the time that the eyes of the young man were watching her approvingly. She started with prettily affected surprise when he stepped through the low French window to join her, and the innocent young theologian did not suspect that she had been posing for his especial benefit.

Their talk ran upon flowers and birds; upon the merits and demerits of the Kansas climate; upon a dozen topics connected with nature-study; and so engrossed had they become in their conversation, that it was with genuine surprise that Hollis saw her father coming for his noon-time meal.

"Hollis stopped to chirp and talk to her canary"

"And I hurried home from Dora's to help mother. You are to blame for my delinquency," she cried, playfully tapping the minister with a rose as she turned to run into the house; and the foolish young man smiled as he picked up the blossom and carefully fastened it on his coat. Evidently his first impression of Miss Hollis Hayward was favorable, a fact which that young lady triumphantly read from the petals of the rose which he wore at the dinner-table a few minutes later.

CHAPTER IV

The Minister Disapproves

THE Rev. Edgar Allan was very disagreeably surprised by the information that a church reception in his honor was to take the place of the mid-week prayer-meeting, and was to be held in the church.

"Is it positively necessary to have the reception on that evening?" he asked. "Indeed, for my own part, no reception would suit me so well as a largely attended prayer-meeting, for in it I would come in touch with the leading church workers. Cannot this social be set for some other evening in the week?"

"Why, no!" replied Mr. Hayward, who had given his pastor the notice of the reception. "The ladies have made all their arrangements for Thursday evening, and it would be almost impossible to change. As for the prayer-meeting, we have never considered it such an inflexible institution that we could not dispense with it for a week when other church interests demanded. It is never very largely attended, as the majority of our members live so far from town that they cannot well come in, especially at this time of year when farm work holds them so late; so you would meet very few of our leading members there. Our other ministers never objected to our taking the prayer-meeting evening for other uses, therefore the ladies did not dream that you would do so."

The disapproval in his tones was so strong that the younger man felt at once that he was treading upon dangerous ground, and that his wisest course would be to submit to what seemed to be inevitable, and bide his time in reforming prayer-meeting conditions. Here, certainly, was one of the sore spots in the Hawthorne church which greatly needed the healing touch of the Great Physician. Therefore he answered:

"While I am very sorry to omit the prayer-meeting for the week, I do not wish to make trouble for those who are seeking to do me honor, and to give me an opportunity to meet the congregation in such a way as to become personally acquainted with them. We will let the appointment stand for this time; but in the future, I hope we can arrange so that nothing will interfere with what I consider the church's most important service."

He expressed this view in carefully chosen words on Sabbath morning after the reception had been announced by the president of the Ladies' Aid Society; feeling rightfully, that he must let his people know just where he stood on such questions, and make his future course clearly defined.

His remarks were received with various feelings by different members of the congregation.

"He's terribly good-goody," Hollis Hayward whispered to Dora Murray.

"You'll soon take that out of him," was Dora's reply, in a tone that caused Hollis to look at her suspiciously. "Look at Mabel Lawrence's face. She'll say 'I told you so,' as quick as the benediction is pronounced; but we've won, anyhow, in spite of her and the preacher, and it will be a new thing in Hawthorne if we cannot hold our own."

"Wait till Kathleen comes home," returned Hollis spitefully.

Across the aisle from the two girls sat Miss Tilly Walker, "dark, thin, and forty," Dora said. She nodded strong approval to the minister's words, and murmured: "You are exactly right, young man; but I can assure you that you are making trouble for yourself already, before you have even had time to preach a sermon. It doesn't do to tread upon Hawthorne's corns so carelessly, and there'll be a howl raised, as sure as you're livin'."

Old Mr. Alison agreed with Miss Walker in opinion.

"Quite right, young mon," he thought; "ye are a fearless soldier o' the cross, but ye'll hae sair fightin' gin ye gang that gait in this kirk. The de'il's surely never far awa frae here, if we did but ken his hidin'-place—an' I could guess whaur it is, I'm a-thinkin'. Ay, mon, there are fearsome times ayont ye, gin ye dinna mind weel yer ways."

Mabel Lawrence whispered to her mother: "Aren't you ashamed for Hawthorne? Mr. Allan will think we are all heathen."

"Do not worry, daughter. If our lives in the future do not prove our innocence

Plain Talk For Plain Folk

HAPPINESS is a modest flower that grows near the ground quite within the reach of every one who cares to grasp it. Unlike fame, splendor, magnificence, wealth or learning, happiness belongs as much to those who make little search for it, as to those who spend life and strength in constant endeavor. The strange thing is that while everybody has a right to be happy, comparatively few people are either as happy as they might be or enjoy happiness all the time. Take, for instance, the common experience of people in married life. While it is doubtless true that for every wreck in married happiness there are several thousand marriages that cannot be counted failures, it is also true that few husbands and wives understand the secret of getting out of the common days the sweetness they have to give. When John and Jane, Stephen and Fanny, respectively pledge their vows at the altar, "for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse, in sickness and in health, till death us do part," they signify to the world that their lots are blended, and that they expect to share fully and completely whatever the future may give them. The first thing that crops up to mar their bliss is selfishness on one side or the other. For example, there may be lack of chivalry on the part of the husband, or lack of consideration on the part of the wife. Not long ago, a man was heard to say, concerning a very chilly house that needed a furnace which he was amply able to provide, "The house is certainly cold, but I am not in it very much."

"Your wife is there from morning until night," was replied.

"Oh, she is busy with the housework, and hasn't time to notice the atmosphere," was the surprising reply. "Besides, if it is cold mornings and evenings, it's just as trying for me as for her."

Thus spoke a man of undoubted integrity and some piety, who was mean and stingy to the core. Could happiness be expected to be more than a withered and stunted branch planted in a soil like that?

A man and woman were seated one day in a railway train, and conversation turned on a bankruptcy that had lately been announced. The woman expressed regret and astonishment. "I fancied," she said, "that the old firm had left Jasper W. an inheritance like the rock of Gibraltar."

"Ah, my dear lady," replied her friend, "the inheritance was all right, but times have altered and competition is far greater in our day, in every line of business, than it was when Jasper's grandfather laid those foundations. Poor Jasper was unfortunate in his marriage. Mrs. Jasper is beautiful, refined and accomplished, but she makes too many demands, too many demands. Jasper can not say no to her. I happened to be aware last year that he was in sore straits, and could not easily meet his obligations. A business friend would have helped him out had it not been that at the very time of his most pressing need Mrs. Jasper appeared in velvet and sables in a new motor-car. The outfit cost a fortune and lost one to extravagance, and if they are unhappy it is because she placed dress and fashion above real needs."

Another reason why married people jog along contentedly enough, but without a single trace of the first fine careless rapture that once glorified their days, is because they forget that compliments and courtesies go far toward diminishing friction. In the halcyon period of courtship Leonard was invariably polite to Louise, and Louise was never brusque and uncivil to Leonard. If little things ruffled either the irritation was not remembered when they met after their brief partings. Reading the love letters sent by John Keats to Fanny Brawne, letters that are brimming over with the exaggeration of a poet's enthusiastic affection, one is tempted to wonder whether, had Keats been spared to marry Fanny instead of dying early, he and she would have kept in the prosaic round of existence the thrilling and impassioned ardor of their first romance. Whether or not this had been possible they would have remained a happy couple to the end had they been constantly and decently decorous and polite.

When a wife ceases to treat her husband with a tender deference, and a husband stops being complimentary and careful in little things in his manner toward his wife, true happiness flies out of the window.

Yet another reef on which a good deal of conjugal happiness goes to pieces is the management of the common income. Husbands and wives too often act very stupidly where money is concerned, the fault lying, it is to be feared, more frequently at the husband's door than at the wife's. A good parson in a New England village was so deeply impressed with the failure of many married men to recognize the wife's right to confidence, and to a reasonable share of spending money, that he preached a sermon on home finance. The senior deacon was observed hastily bundling his wife and daughters into their conveyance after service, with the testy exclamation of, "Let's get away from here. I came to listen to a Gospel sermon, not to be told about dollars and cents."

Thousands of wives who never have a penny to call their own unless they ask for it, would bloom into renewed beauty if there were frankness about money on the part of the husband, and if wives were not treated like irresponsible children.

The wedding ring of a beautiful bride many years ago was engraved with the initials of herself and husband and the motto "One in Christ." From beginning to end that marriage was conspicuously successful and exceedingly happy. Two friends united in marriage and consecrated to Jesus Christ need have little fear that the intimacy of blended souls will ever strike a jarring note. Two such pilgrims will walk together by ways of earthly blessedness until they arrive at their journey's end and reach the heavenly home.

A COUNTRY STORE IN VENEZUELA

Even in Venezuela the country store is a rallying-place for old and young: for the gossips of the country-side, and the children, who like to hear what their elders say. The soft Spanish tongue can lend itself to gossip as well as our English speech.

The Scrap-book Habit

MR. ARTHUR C. BENSON, in one of his clever essays, speaks of the duty of cultivating the habit of memory to carry ourselves lightly like a packhorse. We all know that memory may be trained to serve us almost at our pleasure; but when a slate and pencil hanging from a nail behind the kitchen door will conveniently jot down memoranda for the day, when a pocket diary and an engagement calendar will enable us to keep in mind things that we have to do in the most crowded hours, and when the simple device of cutting out newspaper clippings and pasting them in a book or dropping them into properly labeled envelopes will supply us with volumes for handy reference, it hardly seems worth while to encumber ourselves with a pile of superfluous mental baggage. Rather ought we to let memory remind us of the self-restraint, the politeness and the civility that we always owe our fellow pilgrims. Rather, too, should we reckon that memory is useful for culture which is the result of knowledge, and not merely for knowledge itself in the crude form.

One of the most charming scrap-books ever made by the writer was a [illegible] collection of stories, descriptive bits of poetry, bits, attractive facts and the like cut from newspapers and magazines, and pasted into a large book, without the slightest reference to orderly arrangement. The book was a sort of room, full of the oddest charms and heterogeneous qualities, yet it was a treasure-house of delight for a rainy day, and beyond any book of the kind it might be relied upon for diversion and entertainment. To be thoroughly useful, however, a scrap-book should be made with a definite aim and a constant looking toward the point in view. Thus a minister's scrap-book might be composed of illustrative anecdotes and quotations that would be helpful in writing sermons, or it might be a missionary scrap-book bearing on the progress of Christ's kingdom at home and abroad. A mother's scrap-book would naturally contain a good deal on the subject of children's education, on the care of infants, and on the theory and practice of juvenile upbringing. A housekeeper who should undertake to prepare a useful scrap-book from the daily and weekly press, and from monthly magazines, would soon find herself independent of cook-books, even though they were written by distinguished authors.

All that is really needful in one wishing to construct a useful scrap-book is a pair of scissors, a pot of paste, a brush and a blank book. The book should not be expensive, and it is much better to avoid ruled headings and all aids that oblige one to conform to certain set lines in pasting. You do not want anything that requires delicate handling, and therefore add one more argument to those already opposed.

HEROES OF THE MISSION FIELD

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE lessons of this quarter, covering the conquest and settlement of Canaan, may well be used as illustrations of the missionary conquest of the world, with Christian courage at home and abroad as the central theme. Canaan is a sample of heathenism in all ages. It was a nest of polygamy, tyranny and slavery. War was the common activity of the men. Instead of earning their own living, they robbed their neighbors. The word woman stood for the absence of the two essentials of social welfare, good morals and human rights. Lust was treated as the chief virtue in the very temples. The Canaanites threw their children into the red-hot arms of idols that were but furnaces for which boys and girls were the fuel. Their gods were dreaded by the innocent, not the wicked.

The Heathenism of Canaan

Such heathenism still exists in many a savage island of the Pacific and in many an African village, and the conditions of many men, women and children in India and China are, in many respects, no less horrible. The people of heathendom are usually filthy, and unhealthy and uncomfortable by day, and yet more so in their beds at night. Parents often kill or sell their own children, especially girls, or let them die of neglect. Even in the half-civilized Philippines, half the children do not live the first year out. Education usually waits on the coming of the missionary. Before that the pall of ignorance hangs over the minds of young and old. To a woman, marriage is but enslavement to lust and labor. Life is dark, but death is darker.

In the days of Joshua, God's call to Israel was to be his messenger of justice and exterminate races unfit to live, that in their places a chosen people might live and make it a holy land, through which the world should be conquered spiritually by the proclamation of God's mercy. To this missionary conquest we are all called by the Captain of the Lord's host, who before Jericho commissioned Joshua. The Sunday School teachers are the drill-masters to prepare the church for this conquest. They have in their hands the future missionaries. As in some parts of China if a man commits parricide, those who were his teachers in youth are sought out and punished for not having taught him better, shall not God hold the Sunday School teachers, and especially the Christian parents, who should be the best teachers of all, responsible if the church does not, as it could and should, evangelize the world?

The fearless Japanese samurai, in the days when they were knightly retainers of the daimios, carried two swords. So Joshua carried two swords; the sword of justice and "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." The secret of his success is in his divine Commander's charge (Josh. 1: 8), "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth." For better missionary work the first need is more Bible study. We marvel that even in Great Britain and America, only a little more than a century ago, our devout fathers saw no call to foreign missions in the Bible, and cried to those who did, "Sit down; when God wants to save the heathen he will do it without your help." But we are more guilty, if, seeing the call to missions in all parts of our Bible, we voluntarily "sit down" and act as if God would save the heathen in spite of our failure to do our part.

Converts' Trials

The heroic period of martyrdom in missions is not wholly past, and no less courage is needed to plod on amid the daily hindrances found in nearly all missionary fields. The missionaries of to-day who go to savage communities, leave a land of plenty and variety, for a land oft sore distressed by want. They are surrounded by those against some of whose customs their whole being revolts. There is no water on some islands except that which is obtained in the sand at low tide, which must be carried a couple of miles over coral cliffs. Perhaps the reader may think that a little matter. Certainly it is not much to a native who never needs to wash his clothes, and who, under these conditions, has a bath when it rains or when he is on the beach; but water becomes one of the urgent necessities to a Christian, and specially to the Christian leader. The daily wearing drudgery, the nagging inconvenience, is a heavy burden until faith perceives that it has a halo of glory.

As Joshua thanked God for assured victory when one-third of the Land of Promise was possessed, so may we go forth in confidence of final triumph when more than half of the world is under Christian governments, and when whole races have been transformed, such as the Hawaiians, the Fijians, the Telegus, the Karens, by the power of the Gospel. These child races have not the mental strength of nations long civilized, but the change in their lives is more marked than in that which follows conversions in the churches at home, and the number of conversions, in proportion to the number of preachers and the expenditure, averages far above those of the home churches.

In savage tribes where missionary work has been carried on for a considerable time, tribal wars have become rare, and polygamy, tyranny and slavery are disappearing. The war club has become a curio, and the implements of industry have taken its place. Most of all, in place of the "habitations of cruelty," we find true Christian homes. To the thoughtful traveler more interesting than scenery or bazars are the faces of dark-faced men and women that have been lighted up with intelligence and benevolence by the Spirit of Christ.

A Brave Christian Samoan

Here is a sample of the Christian courage often seen among native Christians. In 1902 and later, repeated efforts were made by Australian missionary leaders to plant a mission on the coral island of Lua Nina, of the South Seas, where the natives speak a language kindred to that of the Samoans and Tongans. Christian teachers from Samoa and Tonga had been twice refused the privilege of landing by the chiefs, influenced by the heathen priests, but when they were refused a third time and the white missionary in charge, Rev. J. F. Goldie, was about to sail away and relinquish his efforts, two noble men positively refused to return with him. They said, "You can take our wives and children back, and we will remain, and if the people will not allow us to go on shore, we will live in the boat, but these people must hear of God's love to them."

"By lot was their inheritance as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses"

A Royal Welcome

After much consideration, Mr. Goldie left the two brave men in the boat, supplying them with provisions and with an old sail with which to make a shelter on the boat, and for three months these men lived there anchored close to the beach until finally they were received by the principal chief at the other end of the lagoon, and since that they have made splendid progress, as will be seen by the letter which Semisi Nau sent to his old missionary and tutor, the Rev. Dr. Moulton, who has supplied the following translation: "For three months I lived on the water, chased and worried by the people on the land, not able to go ashore. At last we had a visit from a chief of the land, called Bobu, who helped us in talking to the people. One day I said, 'Let us try the western islands of the atoll, which are ruled by a different king.' So we went, taking Bobu with us, who translated for us to the king. The king replied that he wished to have a missionary in his land; so I landed, and we no longer lived on the water. A church has been built, and a house for us to live in, and we have begun our work." This letter will show that the old spirit which enabled men and women to suffer, and if needs be, to die for Christ's sake, is not extinct.

Caleb, at eighty-five, asking for that portion of Canaan where he must conquer its mightiest giants before he could enjoy his inheritance, is a type of many an aged Christian hero, yet vigorous in mind and body, because he has kept health and hope by loyalty to God. When we speak of an aged missionary hero, all the world thinks first of beloved Dr. John G. Paton, recently promoted to the King's palace in heaven after more than fifty years of brave service in the New Hebrides. But there are many more white-plumed knights of missions.

Imperfect Bible Heroes

Gideon, who was naturally so timid that he needed half a dozen miracles to develop courage enough to do the heroic tasks God gave him to do, is an encouragement to many of us who are now as timid as he, to seek the faith that shall make us as fearless. Old soldiers at camp fire often merrily confess how much afraid they were when the bullets of an opening battle were whistling about their ears, by way of proving their courage in sticking to their posts nevertheless. Such men are really greater heroes than reckless fellows who care little whether they live or die.

Samson, a half hero, persistently brave in loyal adherence to his double consecration to abstinence and the conquest of the Philistines, yet himself conquered by one bad Philistine woman, is a type of many an imperfect yet useful native Christian who may be on some one line of morals as blind as Samson, and yet in others as loyal and useful as he. The most apostolic in fire and eloquence of the native pastors we met in China the missionaries called "our Peter," because his impulsiveness was constantly getting him into trouble.

Heroism is not all of one type, and some of the best of it is in harmony with the proverb that "still waters run deep." The heroism to which women are called is seldom of the masculine type that distinguished Joan of Arc, the military deliverer of France, and Grace Darling, the lighthouse-keeper's daughter, who in her little boat braved the waves and wind to save a wrecked ship's crew. Woman's heroism is oftener shown in endurance. Such was the courage of the brave young widow Ruth, who faced the poverty she anticipated in the Holy Land for the sake of love—love to Naomi and Naomi's God.

Here it is fitting to quote what President Roosevelt said at the unveiling of a monument to the soldier, General McClellan: "There is one person that I put ahead of the soldier—the really good woman, the good wife and mother who has done her full duty. She often has a pretty hard time, yet the woman who thus with labor and anxiety brings up her children is blessed among women, blessed among men. I do not pity her in the least. I respect and admire her and hold her worthy of admiration and honor. The selfish creature, man or woman, who reaches old age, having achieved ease by shirking duty, is to be heartily despised and not envied. Our admiration is reserved for him or her who has done the work which makes the next generation able, in its turn, to do its work in the country."

A Kaffir's Conversion

A beautiful parallel to the story of heathen Ruth, drawn to God by the sweet saintliness of Naomi, is the following fresh story from South Africa: A Kaffir came to a mission at Tsomo for medicine. His heart was weak, his nerves were shattered; in a word, he was on the downward grade. The missionary was surprised as he quietly said, "I want to be a Christian." A little questioning soon told that he had a Christian wife, and that though she had said little or nothing to her husband about becoming a Christian, the powerful influence of a real Christian life had been doing its work, and the man confessed that ever since his wife became a Christian he had "longed to live this beautiful life." But it is not to be expected that a Kaffir could ask a woman to teach him. He drank in the story of the prodigal son. The missionary and he knelt, and he repeated the prayer that was taught him, and learnt that trust must be placed simply but entirely in Christ the Saviour; that we must thank God for all the blessings of life, and then prove our gratitude by daily service. It was a pleasant sight as the man stood up, to see the light of heaven on his face.

MORRISON'S TRUST

By EUPHEMIA HOLDEN

MR. MORRISON glanced about his library. The harmony of it and its charming furnishings almost hurt him. What was to become of his home, his wife, his child—himself? What a cruel mockery of destiny, that he should have been able to give them these things, to accustom them to luxury, and then—and then—where would it all end? The bank in which he kept his private and his business accounts was the bank which had failed. The corporations in which he held stock were among the few that had gone to the wall in the recent days of panic. He had been a marked man. Others had not suffered so. Of course, he could sell to-morrow other securities, which would give them enough for the present; but——

He thrust his hand into his pocket and pulled out some money—a ten dollar bill—a bright fifty cent piece, and a few odd dimes and nickels. As he sat staring at these, some one opened the door without knocking and a voice said softly:

"Jackie wants to play with papa."

"Come in, Jackie."

A sturdy little lad scrambled up on the man's knees and laid his round head down on his father's breast.

"What makes papa all alone and look like this—" here the boy puckered his forehead in sharp lines—"mother all tears in her eyes? Jackie doesn't like it so."

The man bent and kissed the child's forehead.

"Does mother cry?" he asked tenderly. "And she was so brave to my face—bless her proud little heart!"

"What's papa got in his hand?" demanded Jackie. Morrison opened the fingers he had closed down over the pitiful little pile of coin.

"Oh! oh! oh!" cried Jackie, plucking out the bright fifty cent piece, "Jackie wants this, please, papa."

The man hesitated; then, half ashamed, added quickly, "of course, Jackie boy. Isn't it a pretty thing?"

The boy examined the coin carefully; then pointed at some words close to the edge.

"What does it say on Jackie's play toy, papa?"

"It says, 'In God We Trust'," Morrison repeated mechanically.

"What does that mean, papa?" asked the boy slowly.

"It means," the man began, "it means that we must— why that— I don't believe I know just what it does mean. Do you, boy, dear?"

"Why, don't you know, papa? You know everything, don't you?"

"Indeed not, Jackie, not even enough to answer my boy's questions sometimes."

"Well, God is Our Father Which is in Heaven; I say that every night. Did God make the new money, papa?"

"No-o," replied Morrison, "I don't believe he did."

"But he made everything," insisted the boy; "he made you and me and mamma; mamma said so."

"Ye-es," Morrison admitted slowly. "He made the living things, surely. Who else could?"

"What does 'Trust' mean, papa?" asked the boy, returning to the coin.

"I could tell you better what 'trusts' mean, Jackie boy," the man said with a bitter laugh. "They're places where you put your money because you think it will be safe, and you get awfully fooled sometimes, and your money is all taken away from you, and you hardly dare spare your own boy a bright fifty-cent piece."

"But God doesn't take money away, does he? God is our Father. Fathers give things. They don't take them away. You never take Jackie's things away—do you, papa?"

"No-o," said Morrison slowly.

"Then what does the play toy mean, 'In God We Trust?'" said the boy, his puzzled eyes raised to his father's face.

Morrison hesitated. His throat was rather tight. "I suppose," he said at length, "that it means I ought to trust Our Father as you do yours."

A long silence followed, for Morrison was thinking deeply. "Jackie," he said at length, "jump down and run to the book shelves over there and get father a black book with red and gold edges. 'Way down at the bottom—see—there—" for the boy had obeyed the request promptly. "Perhaps that will answer your question."

"Why, that's the Bible," exclaimed Jackie. "Sometimes mamma reads about God and Jesus. It's awful dusty, papa," he added, clambering back into Morrison's lap.

"Guess it is," said the man slowly. "Papa hasn't read it for a long time—here——"

Morrison dusted it with his pocket-handkerchief, and then turned to the concordance. "Trust," he read aloud, "trust, Job, Psalms, Proverbs—they all have something to say about it, 'trust in God'; 'blessings resulting from trust': 'trust in man, riches, vain.' Let's try Psalms. I always liked the sound of them. 'I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and my fortress, my God, in him will I trust.' That sounds pretty good, doesn't it?"

The boy nodded.

"And Proverbs, let me see: 'Trust in the Lord with all thine heart and lean not unto thine own understanding.' That's it, boy; 'not unto thine own understanding.' Isn't that wonderful? Why, there's where we all miss it. We believe in our own brain and our own hand and in power and money here, this is what Paul says, 'nor in uncertain riches but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy.' The living God—the living God—not gold or stocks or real estate or will power—that's trusting in other gods; and it says, 'Thou shalt have no other god before me'."

A sudden light seemed to have flooded the man's consciousness. It sparkled in his face, his whole expression changed. He saw how completely, during the last few years, he had allowed the lust for gold to dominate his life. Yet he had believed himself a model husband and father; and what had come of it all? Loss, failure, poverty—nothing. How blind he had been!

He became conscious of his child's eyes gazing wonderingly into his own. The child's look was half-curious, half-awed.

"I'm not going to do it any more, Jackie," he said suddenly. "I'm going to trust in God—that's what the text means—don't you see, boy, don't you see?"

The lad nodded his yellow head vigorously.

"The Bible and the trust words make you feel good—don't they, papa?"

For answer, Morrison gathered his boy into his arms.

Mrs. Morrison came quickly into the room. "Jackie boy," she exclaimed, as she saw the two, "I didn't know you were

"'What does that mean, papa?' asked Jackie, pointing to the coin"

[illegible]

Next morning when Morrison entered his office there was a cheerful smile on his face.

"I suppose you've heard the news?" said his secretary. "Things look better, don't you think?"

"Do they?" inquired Morrison. "I was busy reading something else and didn't take time for the paper."

The man looked up in astonishment. Morrison not reading the morning paper in time like these!

"Well," replied the secretary, "the Administration has secured money to meet all demands, trades and promises a speedy settlement. Johnson, of Martin & Johnson, can sell any reasonable stock you want to get rid of, and Foster [illegible] he had some money to lend and gave me an option on it until eleven this morning."

"Pretty good," said Morrison, helpfully. "It wasn't exactly as bad as we imagined, was it? Send in Cole. I want to dictate a letter."

"You will take up those matters right away?"

"In a few minutes. I want to write a letter to the President first. He has some right on his side, but I believe it's the greatest mistake to issue fiat money off the press. It does lots of good. If every man in Wall Street should read it each time it was passed through his hands there would never be another panic. Send in Cole right away, please."

Mrs. W. T. B., East Douglas, Mass. What was the name of the dying penitent thief on the cross?

Tradition gives the names of the two thieves as Dismas and Gestas. The former was the penitent.

J. B., Paterson, N. J. Is it reasonable, as some of the newspapers here are doing, to attribute any serious or hostile purpose to Japan, in recalling her Ambassador at the present time?

The fact that Ambassador Aoki's departure is simultaneous with the sailing of the American fleet is not necessarily important, or indicative of a hostile purpose. He has been summoned home, he says, to make a verbal report on conditions interesting both Japan and ourselves. There is no reason for doubting Japan's friendliness or good faith now any more than in the past. The Mikado's government has always acted honorably.

Mrs. W. R., St. Paul, Minn. I recently heard a statement made by a minister in the pulpit that there was not a statement in the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, urging church attendance. Is this statement true?

You must certainly have misunderstood him, for such a statement is absurd, and from a preacher, incredible. In both the Old and New Testaments there are numerous passages enjoining attendance in God's house as a duty, a delightful pleasure and a great spiritual privilege. See Lev. 8: 3; Deut. 4: 10; Psalm 23: 6; 26: 8; 27: 4; 84: 1, 4, 10; 122: 1; Neh. 13: 11; Micah 4: 2; Matt. 18: 19, 20; Acts 4: 31; 15: 25; Heb. 10: 25. Take your reference Bible and look up, through the marginal notes, still other references.

Western Reader, Butte, Mont. Why is the bowie knife so called?

It is named after R. P. Bowie, who made the first one about 1820. It has often been ascribed to Col. James Bowie, but this is considered incorrect.

J. O. Y., Galesburg, Ill. Does the study of astronomy, geology, etc., tend to make one religious or irreligious?

It was Young who wrote, "an undevout astronomer is mad," meaning that the study of the celestial system led the mind to the reverent contemplation of the great Creator of all. This we believe is the uniform experience of astronomers, who, almost without exception, are men of deep religious feeling and profound convictions. There may be exceptions, but we do not recall them.

Old Subscriber, Rutland, Vt. What is the "facial angle"?

It is the angle obtained by drawing a line from the middle of the ear to the edge of the nostrils, and another from that point to the ridge of the frontal bone. It was devised by Peter Camper to measure the elevation of the forehead. In Europeans, the angle is from 75 to 85 degrees.

C. F. Sheldon, New Britain, Conn., writes:

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I find the account of the sailing of the missionary party under the Rev. Mr. Downey for the mission field in Africa. In the list of names as given there is an omission of three names, viz.: Miss Florence J. Pierce, Miss Margaret Frazer and Miss Mary A. Slater. These three are members of the People's Church of New Britain, Conn., and are sent out and supported by the Gospel Missionary Society, which is a subordinate branch of the "African Inland Mission." In addition to the three now going out with Mr. Downey, we have nine others already on the field.

E. S. S., Webster, Mass. "Cleanliness is next to godliness." This quotation is found in one of John Wesley's sermons. I cannot get any information about it, and so send to THE HERALD, hoping to find the author of the expression.

It is taken from the Beraitha—one of the sacred Hindu books—where it is an expression used in the last Mishna of Sola.

This letter, from a bright young Kentuckian, describes conditions that are duplicated to-day in many hundreds of localities:

About one year ago our town voted "no saloons," and now our whole county is prohibition: but the express companies are carrying whisky into our local option territory, and in spite of the tears that are shed and the prayers that are offered, some of our boys are on the road to ruin. Our little village post-office has recently been made a mail order office, simply to accommodate those who wish to send orders for whisky. At least we believe this to be a fact, because before the boys and young men got to ordering whisky, there were not enough orders sent from here to justify a mail order office. We haven't any express office: but the packages of whisky are sent, and the boys wait at the trains to receive them. What are we to do? There are men who are determined to ruin our boys, regardless of how we vote and pray.

Can you not devote several pages of your valuable paper (may God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD!) to an extended open discussion of what steps people living in local option territory can take to protect themselves against other States shipping whisky into territory that is prohibition?

I feel that by discussing this question in your paper, it will be brought before the thinking people of our country. It is a question that should rest on the heart of every Christian in our land.

A KENTUCKY GIRL.

Probably if the facts were laid before the proper authorities, State or county, means would be found to stop the lawbreakers from continuing this abuse.

H. L., Newark, N. J. When did Confucius live and what did he teach?

He lived between 551 and 479 B.C. His doctrines are the basis of law and education in China. The teaching inculcates no worship of God, and is a system of philosophy rather than a religion.

K. H., Hubbard, O. I have in my memory part of a beautiful poem from the German, which appeared in a newspaper of Philadelphia about 1859 or 1860. Can any of your readers reproduce it? One verse begins thus:

Last night as we sat where the twilight passed through,
All laden with perfume and starry with dew.

G. L. Z., Tampico, Ill. You said in answering a question recently that men may be saved outside the church. Have you any authority for the statement?

The gist of our answer was that the church was the natural and normal place for the saved man, and that he could do more good in it than outside it. The statement you quote, referred to exceptional cases, in which there were reasons for men remaining outside. The reasons may be like the circumstances of Zaccheus, in which no synagogue would have received him. Or, like the penitent thief on the cross, who had no opportunity of entering a church. Or, like the eunuch whom Philip baptized, whose home was a long way from a church. Or, like the Philippian jailer, who was surely saved outside the church. As we have said repeatedly, it is a duty to join a church, but we do not think that God waits to have the endorsement of a church before he saves a man.

N. E. W., Carthage, Miss. What was the family name of the Duke of Wellington who defeated Napoleon at Waterloo?

The Duke of Wellington's name was Arthur Wellesley. For his distinguished military service he was made first a baron, then in turn a viscount and a marquis, and finally, in 1814, Duke of Wellington.

Anxious, Philadelphia, Pa. How is it that the children of Christians die in their sins, though prayers for their conversion are offered in faith?

The fact has often perplexed the Christian. You must remember that prayer is not the only thing necessary. An aged pastor of wide experience recently stated that he had analyzed many such cases and in every one had found a very plain reason for the child going wrong. Prayer had been made, but the child was neglected, and had not received Christian training. In one case the mother who had prayed, had a large number of religious engagements, and though she had been successful in leading many to Christ, had paid little attention to her own daughter. God expects us to do our part in the work. There are cases, however, in which the parent has done a Christian's full duty and has prayed earnestly, and yet the child has not been converted. Such cases cannot be explained. The Christian parent's duty, however, is plain: to go on in faith and leave the matter with God.

J. P. F., Atlanta, Ga. Should a person who sins wilfully and does not repent be expelled from the church?

That is an extreme measure which should be avoided if possible. The aim should rather be to save the brother, to bring him to repentance. To expel him is easy, but his repentance and restoration are worth trying for. Christ gave directions as to the course to pursue (Matt. 18: 15-17) where the offense is personal, but not as to such a case as you refer to. A case of the kind

The soap you find in most sleeping cars and hotels is, usually, not the kind of soap you use at home.

As a rule, it is highly perfumed—and artificially colored. Possibly, you like that kind of soap. Probably, you do not. But, in a hotel, you have no choice.

So, here's a suggestion—slip a half cake of Ivory Soap in your toilet-case before you leave home.

With it, you can keep your hands, face and body scrupulously clean. If necessary, you can use it for shaving. Thousands of men do; and like it.

occurred at Corinth of a grossly immoral character, which appears to have been dealt with by suspension, according to Paul's direction (I. Cor. 5: 11). The course adopted is not fully described, but the effect appears to have been good, for in his next epistle Paul refers to his repentance and directs his restoration (II. Cor. 2: 6, 7). Hasty action is to be deprecated, and only when all other means have failed should expulsion be resorted to.

M. I. T., Water Valley, Ky. 1. Which is the oldest book in the Bible? 2. Who wrote the last chapter of Deuteronomy?

1. It is not positively known. There are indications in the book of Exodus, especially in the twentieth chapter, which suggest that it may have preceded the other books. The book of Job also has the marks of age, but it is improbable that such philosophy and such refined language would exist before those of Exodus. 2. Probably Joshua or one of the priests.

D. B. R., Wells River, Vt., writes:

In your issue of November 27 you state that Vermont has 112 towns "dry." You will find a good many more dry. In Vermont we have the Local Option Law of 1907, and at town meetings held in March, out of 246 towns and cities the vote for license towns voting "No" stood 214; "Yes" 32.

G. E., Sievert Portage, Wis. 1. Should a Christian give one-tenth of his income to Christ's cause? 2. What are we to understand by the twenty-three hundred years of Daniel's prophecy (Daniel 8: 14)?

1. That was the proportion the Jew was required to give for the service of God. Under the Christian dispensation there is liberty instead of law, but the principle of proportionate giving is enjoined (I. Cor. 16: 2). Proportionate giving, however, is scarcely fulfilled by putting aside a tenth. The man with a large income can easily spare more than a tenth, while the man whose earnings scarcely pay for board and clothes would find it difficult to spare a tenth. If you deduct from your income the cost of absolute necessaries and pay a tenth or a fifth of the balance you would reach a fairer system of proportionate giving. 2. It is as there set down to extend to the cleansing of the sanctuary—that is, to the expulsion of the Mohammedan from the site of the Jewish Temple. Some expositors believe the period began in 445 B.C. and extended to 1856 A.D.

A. K. S., Pottstown, Pa., writes:

Your story of the "Golden Rule Saloon" reminds me of a case that occurred here. Judge —— sold his home near this town. He invested the money in a hotel, but resolved that he would keep a tavern only for what it was intended for, viz.: to furnish a home for travelers, for meals and lodging, and to feed horses. But he soon found that the people he wanted were few, and those he did not want were the ones who called. In a short time he had a chance to sell the place and he did so. He never tried to keep a "Golden Rule Saloon" after his first experience. As another has said, "selling whisky and religion" do not go together. One or the other must be given up.

A. H. S., Monroe, Mich. How old was Samson when he died and how long was he in prison?

According to leading commentators and Bible students, Samson could not have been more than fifty-five or sixty years of age when he died. He was born about 1200 B.C. (some think about 1160 B.C.), and judged Israel twenty years. Previous to his leadership Israel had been forty years subject to the Philistines. Samson's death, according to some commentators, took place about 1140, while others make it twenty years later, or about 1120.

D. H., Albany, N. Y. Can you give some information concerning the ship Half Moon, in which Henry Hudson sailed up the river that now bears his name? What became of the ship?

The Half Moon was a vessel of 80 tons. It was very high decked at bow and stern, and probably had three masts. Under the command of Henry Hudson it set sail from Amsterdam April 4, 1609. It entered New York Bay on September 11, anchored for the night above the site of Yonkers September 13, anchored near West Point September 14, anchored near Catskill Landing September 15. On September 17 it was off the site of Hudson, and on September 19 dropped anchor just below the site of Albany. Here a boat was lowered and sent to investigate the river further up. This boat went as far as the rapids not far from Waterford. On September 23 the Half Moon started on its return journey and sailed out of New York Harbor on October 4. The ship was wrecked on March 6 1615, on the island of Mauritius.

ASTRONOMICAL QUERIES

By Professor Samuel Phelps Leland

D. W., Orange, N. J. What is the name of the constellation rising in the northeastern sky between 9 and 10 o'clock P.M.? It is somewhat similar in shape to the Dipper, and in my boyhood days I frequently confused the two.

It is the Little Milk-Dipper in Sagittarius.

Replying to an inquiry by H. K. H., Georgiana, Fla., Prof. Leland writes:

"The orbit of Mars is quite eccentric. When the planet is in perihelion, as it has been the past summer, this eccentricity is most clearly marked. The path of the planet at such a time bears to the north of east. The planet, being so near to the earth, gives it an apparent motion much faster than when at a further distance, but this is apparent only. This is seen in observing a train of cars, for instance, a half mile away. Though moving at thirty miles an hour it seems to be running very slowly, but if within a few hundred feet of the observer the movement is very rapid, and increases as the distance shortens."

E. V. C., Georgetown, Tex. Dr. Charles A. Young, in his text-book on astronomy (page 165), says that the moon rotates on its axis once a month. Now, as a matter of fact, does the moon rotate on its axis at all? It appears to me that it rotates around the point where its surface cuts the line joining its centre with the centre of the earth. If it rotates on its axis, it could not keep the same side toward the earth all the time. I wish you would have Professor Leland give his opinion.

The statement quoted is correct. The moon revolves on its axis in the same time that it makes its revolution around the earth; hence we never see but one side of the moon. To make this clear, stand in your room with your face to the south, for instance. Place a chair directly in front of you. Walk around the chair with your face continually towards it. When you are half way around you will be facing the north, and when you have performed your complete circuit you will have yourself turned round; that is, you have turned yourself around on your axis in the same time of your revolution around the chair. This illustrates rudely the motion of the moon around the earth. The explanation suggested in the question will not explain the facts.

The Triumph of Missions*

MORE has been done during the past hundred years [illegible] than in any century since [illegible] days. The time is now rapidly approaching in which the church will be able to say that it has been proclaimed in every land. This of course is far from saying that every land has been evangelized. Even in countries to which the missionary has gone there are large districts still to be reached, and probably not more than one-half of the world's inhabitants have ever heard the Gospel preached or have even heard of Christ. Truly there is still much land to be possessed. But the church may well take courage as she looks back. At the beginning of the last century, the triumph of the Cross could be seen only in Western Europe, North America, and Australia. All Asia and Africa, and the greater part of South America lay in darkness. Mohammed, Buddha, and heathenism held possession, and the church did not believe that even if it spoke any one would listen to its voice. There was as much surprise in the Christian world when the first missionaries reported their success, as there was in the Jewish world when Peter and Paul told how the Gentiles had received the Holy Spirit.

The encouraging aspect of the survey of the world to day is that the strategic points are won, and that the way is now open for conquest. It has been a hard battle and many lives have been sacrificed to the climate and to the hostility of the people, but there has been no halt in the movement. As the pioneer fell, even though it was under the club of the savage, who was waiting to kill his successor, volunteers were always ready. Martyrs in Madagascar, in Erromanga, in Africa, in China, but ever the response, "Here am I, send me." Men were ready to leave home and country and friends and civilization to carry the news of the Gospel to virgin fields. They translated the Bible and preached Christ and in every land there has been fruit.

What more can be done? The missionary staff needs to be largely increased. One missionary to occupy a field of nearly a million persons is not the way to success. The promise of a large increase is given by the plan now being worked through this office, of giving the missionary native help. This, too, has the additional advantage of enlisting the interest and the prayers of the home church. In this way and by the increase of the white missionaries through the church boards there comes the hope of victory and the fulfilment of the promise.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Mine of Anecdotes*

PROBABLY for several years there has not appeared a book so filled with anecdotes of live men and women as that from the facile pen of Mr. George T. B. Davis in Twice Around the World with Alexander, the Prince of Gospel Singers. Mr. Davis well understood that many books of travel have been printed describing places and things. He therefore, while giving to the full what painters call the "local color" of the places passed through, has devoted more space to the people who were met and influenced by Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander. Consequently the story possesses a human interest that appeals to the young and the old alike.

The anecdotes have the unusual merit of being new, and not those that are told of the same places and people over and over again, with slight changes of wording, by so many writers of books of travel. Mr. Alexander's tour brought him into contact with the highest aristocracy and the submerged tenth of the countries visited. In London, for example, we find his meetings being opened by the Earl of Kinnaird, while some of his most active personal workers were regenerated outcasts of the street. The story of Ashlyn, the music hall singer, who turned from amusing the public to singing the Glory Song and working for their eternal welfare, is as fascinating a tale as could appear in the most popular magazines. The story of Colonel Beauchamp is also one of the best, and that of Mel. Trotter has a most pathetic interest.

The book opens with sketches of the singer's days in the mountains of Tennessee, a region which made such a lasting impression on Mr. Alexander that he has given the name of his State to his present home in England. The simple American life of these sturdy, thrifty mountaineers is brought well before the reader. Then rapidly the scene changes to university days and life at the Moody Institute in Chicago. It was from Chicago that Mr. Alexander started on his first Gospel tour. The account of the Australian campaign is most inspiring. Then again the scene changes, and in New Zealand we find that the people are progressive, and that the days of the tribesmen are as much a thing of the past as are those of our own primitive Western plains. India is reached, and Mr. Alexander is surprised to see "sunbeam" choirs, composed of little Indian orphans, who sing the "sunbeam" song in a way to make the American and the English visitors gasp with astonishment.

Of course, much time was spent in London, and the accounts of social conditions there and in Scotch cities and Irish communities are such as to keep the reader turning page after page. The stories used to illustrate song and sermon by the evangelists and by the converts themselves, passed from Whitechapel to the court of the King of Denmark, where we find the royal chamberlain repeating them to his royal master and an interested circle of nobles and statesmen.

Canada and the United States are visited, and a return is made to Europe. Mr. Alexander, on his second tour, spent much time in China, and the reader realizes, as never before, the heroism of the missionaries who passed through the dark and thrilling days of the Boxer Rebellion.

On the way back to Birmingham, Mr. Alexander stopped in New York, where he spoke and sang in the famous Bowery Mission. He also spent a day at Mont-Lawn, where he made fast friends of the children.

The words and music of the songs that "set the whole world humming" find a place among the other attractive features of the book. The pictures taken during the two journeys add greatly to its permanent value. They not only lend to the work additional interest and vividness, but also strikingly show what a remarkable stage of perfection the art of illustration has reached.

Twice Around the World is a volume that should be in the hands of every clergyman, who will find it a mine of anecdote from which may be drawn telling points for his sermons. Every class-leader will find some story that will impress his lesson on the mind of the scholars. For the general reader it has the charm of remarkable events told in a masterly fashion.

* Twice Around the World with Alexander, the Prince of Gospel Singers, by George T. B. Davis, is one of the attractive premiums offered this year by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is beautifully bound in a fine red art cloth, stamped in gold. It contains 382 pages and the numerous illustrations are in double tone ink. The book and the superb Calendar for 1908 and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for an entire year are all given for only $2. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 to 116 Bible House, New York.

A Canal-Boat Cruise*

EARLY that afternoon the great brown sail was hoisted and our tubby boat waddled through the lock, into the placid canal, and out into the country. How fresh and clean and flat it was, and how vividly green was the grass! It usually rains twenty days in the month, but this was one of the bright exceptions, and there was a brisk wind blowing fresh from the rim of the ocean. The canals, little and big, ran in every direction, one moment sparkling brilliantly in the sun and the next obscuring under the soft gloom of a racing cloud-shadow. Here and there in the distance, the arms of a windmill were silently whirling, and occasional red-tiled roofs made a lovely note of color above their encircling trees.

A brick roadway ran along by the canal that we traveled, and I was constrained to make an occasional note of the people and traffic that passed to and from the town. I don't know why, but all the men seemed preternaturally grave. They were dressed—in many instances it would be more correct to say that they were patched—in blue and brown, with an occasional admixture of red. Holland is certainly the land of artistic patches. Take, for instance, our very worthy captain; a thrifty man, and prosperous, with a neat sum tucked away. Yet, see his shirt! Patched and repatched—and patched again, in varying shades of red and brown, until it has been completely metamorphosed. As to the original color, no man knoweth, but here is wonderful mosaic of soft tones, put together with infinite skill and patience. It is, moreover, still in a state of evolution, for the process may go on indefinitely. I take it that the purchase of a new shirt is a solemn rite, and not to be entered upon with indecent haste or thoughtlessness. Here is a prospective heirloom, and one's children's children may gaze with pride upon it. And yet Barney O'Toole, whose specialty is mortar, and who possesses nothing save a numerous progeny and a very doubtful insurance policy, would flee in terror at the thought of wearing it.

The women are not nearly so solemn or so be-patched as the men, and they seem to be waging an incessant warfare against dirt and rust; scrubbing pots and pans at the backs of the quaint little houses, scrubbing the door-sills and steps in front; and we passed one over-zealous soul, scrubbing a weather-beaten fence as if it were the one ambition of her life.

* Holland Sketches, by Edward Penfield, from which the above extract is taken, is an account of the author's experiences in the land of canals and windmills. He has written of the everyday life of the peasantry and sketched and painted their quaint figuree and quainter homes. The illustrations are all in color. Pp. 147. Price $2.50. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers, New York.

Books Received

The Messages of Jesus according to the Gospel of John. By John Stevenson Riggs, D.D. As explained in former notices of the series of handbooks of which this volume forms part, the object of the editors is to shed light on the different groups of Bible literature. The "Messages of the Earlier and Later Prophets" have been of great value to Bible students everywhere. The plan pursued is to give a brief introduction, presenting the historical and critical setting and making the main body of the book a paraphrase, giving in a connected readable whole the work under consideration. In this volume, the life and teaching of Jesus, as John describes them, appear like a modern biography. More clearly than in a commentary, the difficult passages are understood, as they are presented in paraphrase. Pp. 374; price $1.25; published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Religion and Experience, by J. Brierley, B.A. Every one who has read the brief pithy articles signed "J. B." has learned to look in them for something entirely new, even though the subject is old as the hills. His own illustration of the eclipse, which is the same phenomenon, whether described by the savage who is terrified by its mystery, or by the astronomer who sees in it the verification of his forecast, is a type of his work. The events of life, the problems of life, take on new forms as he handles them, and while we agree with him we wonder that we had never seen them in that light before. Therefore, when we find him dealing in this volume with "the psychology of prayer," "the broadening of life," "the religion of calamity," "the farther side," and kindred topics to the number of thirty-four, we are sure that we have here suggestive food for thought that is well worth study. Pp. 310; price $1.50. Published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 Bible House, New York.

The Final Account*

LIFE as a stewardship was a favorite conception of Paul's. It seems to have been with him always, in his work and in his preaching. Its effect was potent, keeping him earnest, intense, true in word and conduct, and raising him above the disquiet that criticism might have caused him. It was a small matter to him, that men should judge him; there was a more serious judgment, beside which every other sank into nothingness. It was that with which he was concerned, and all other decisions might go as they would. Thus he derived consolation even from the occasion which he felt to be so solemn and was not worried by the censures of others. We see by his epistles that he was not always kept in this condition of sublime indifference; but, like ourselves, he sometimes lost sight of his consolation. There were times when he keenly felt the hostile criticism of his friends and had to refresh himself with a recollection of the accounting.

To so conscientious a man that inquisition could not be otherwise than encouraging. The judge would be Christ, whom he had served with unswerving fidelty—Christ, for whom he had suffered imprisonment, beating, shipwreck, stoning and the ostracism of all his friends. Above all it was Christ, who knew him thoroughly, who would not misjudge his motives; when he stood at that bar, it would not be to be tried for his life, but to have his work estimated and to receive the reward it deserved. There he expected to be accounted worthy to receive little or much, and he was content, as well he might be, to leave the decision in Christ's hands. To him of all men would the words be spoken, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

The same consolation in less degree may be the possession of every Christian. Few escape censure, and some do not escape slander. It is the fate of the believer to be misjudged and misunderstood. If he can only keep fast hold of the truth that he who sent him to his work, knows all he does and appreciates his faithful service, he is not disturbed by human judgment. He is a steward who will in the end give an account of his stewardship to him who is merciful, and there is no other judgment that he need consider. Time, talents, opportunities will all be taken into account in that court, and though there may be much to be deplored, we may be sure the judgment will be fair and merciful.

to him, we deserve to have him think such things of us," was the wise answer.

"The dominie has put his foot in it, and that's a fact. If Hollis Hayward don't make him sorry, I'll miss my guess; and I'll wager he turns your cake into dough in less than six weeks," murmured Glenn Fraser to Charlie Lester, who frowned as he answered:

"The church is no place for betting."

"This one is," returned Glenn irreverently. "I'd like to bet on who'll come out ahead on this prayer-meeting business, if I could get a taker," and then he bent his head for the closing prayer.

The reception was much like all such functions, except that, in lack of church parlors, it took place in the audience-room, which had been transformed into a reception hall as far as possible. Lace curtains draped the windows; chairs had been ranged around the walls, or in little groups through the centre of the room; rugs, sofa-pillows and fancy tables filled all available places.

Hollis had sent her piano to the church, and had it placed in a conspicuous position, ready for a musical programme in which she assigned herself several numbers. Small tables for refreshments had been placed upon the pulpit and choir platforms, where fruit salad with whipped cream and cake were served—a triumph for Mabel Lawrence's contingent which Dora Murray had secretly assisted in accomplishing, much to Hollis' anger.

As Mr. Hayward had predicted, a large crowd was present, and Mr. Allan had the opportunity of meeting the greater part of his congregation. To his unaccustomed mind, the evening was a painful one. He had never seen the audience-room of a church used as this one was, and the sight of the refreshment tables standing in the place of the pulpit filled him with indignation, which a moment later was increased to horror.

Hearing his name called, he turned to see Hollis Hayward holding toward him a glass of orange sherbet. His first thought was, "How very pretty the girl looks to-night!"

Then his eyes noted with horror that the punch bowl over which she presided was placed upon the communion table; and the answer he had ready for her froze upon his lips.

"Thank you, Miss Hayward, but I believe I do not care for punch," he said, as he turned back to his interrupted conversation with Miss Tilly Walker, while Hollis bit her lips with vexation. Her effort to call the young minister to her side in exact time to secure his escort to the refreshment tables had been made in vain. A moment later, instead of the summons which she had anticipated, he politely escorted Miss Walker, whom Hollis called "that red-headed old maid," to the place of honor, and Miss Hollis was left to her other admirers.

The troubled young minister was unable to sleep for several hours after his return from that reception. So many things conspired to make the memory of it unpleasant that, even after sleep came to his weary eyes, his dreams were filled with visions of desecrated communion tables, pianos discoursing the latest dance music, and churches filled with merry-makers, while the earnest words of prayer that should have been raised to God were not heard that evening.

"What do you think of our new minister?" Charlie Lester asked as he escorted Hollis Hayward to her home after that reception.

"I thought him adorable, until this evening. He was so sulky over that prayer-meeting that he was hardly civil; and to cap the climax, he took old Miss Tilly Walker to supper. Did you ever see anything so ridiculous?"

"I thought he acted with perfect propriety," said the young man. "He was talking with her when refreshments were announced, and it was eminently proper that he should invite her to go with him. Besides, it kept all you girls from tearing hair over him," Charlie ended teasingly. His words struck too near the truth to be agreeable to his irritated companion.

"Now don't be horrid!" she cried. "We girls are not quite so silly as you appear to think us. Mr. Allan will have to learn that preachers are not supreme in this town. Also, if he prefers the company of old maids, he is welcome to it. That's all I have to say."

Charlie wisely forebore any reply to this heated speech, but turned to topics which were more soothing to the lady's ruffled vanity.

Glenn Fraser discussed the events of the evening with several acquaintances, in his own reckless style.

"The dominie put his foot in it again to-night. Did you ever see anything funnier than the reverend gentleman escorting old Miss Walker to the table while Hollis Hayward swallowed her wrath in gulps? She might just as well have left the prayer-meeting alone, for all the good it did her to force everybody else to put it off. If the Rev. Edgar Allan will only teach that girl that she doesn't possess all the brains of Hawthorne, and all the power of a Catherine of Russia, his coming will be a blessing to the town; only he is liable to get himself banished to Siberia before he gets her deposed. If she don't lose Charlie Lester, I'll lose another guess. I do hope that Hawthorne has at last gotten a preacher who will dare to live up to his convictions, and won't get starved out while he is doing it. I'll be one of ten of you boys to add one hundred dollars to his salary next year, if he wins out. What do you say?"

DIVINE PATIENCE

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHY do we not conquer all which God has given into our hand? Why are we not "more than conquerors" over the evil of our hearts and the failures in our characters, inherited perhaps from our parents? Why have they not yielded, like Jericho's walls, before the presence of God within us? Why do impatience, worry, discontent—perhaps even strife, avenging and jealousy—still dwell in the land which God has purchased for himself in the lives of his own blood-bought children? Our Leader, our Saviour, does not fail us; but are there not many who fail him? Are there not Christians who even justify the presence of such things in them, and excuse them on the plea that they are inherited, and thus grieve the Spirit of God, and dishonor the Lord that bought them?

Oh, how grievous is it to read that the people whom God had redeemed to himself failed to dispossess the inhabitants and to conquer all the land which God had given them! There were some grand exceptions. One of these was Caleb. Forty long years this man of God had been kept back by the sin of his people from his possessions in Canaan. He must suffer for their sin, as every one of us has to suffer for the sin of the church. But God, in a wonderful way, set his seal upon Caleb. For forty years this man of eighty-five had not declined in vigor. Parallel with the clothing and the shoes, which were kept from wearing out in the wilderness (Deut. 8: 4), was the physical frame of Caleb. And he asked for his portion the very mountain country with its giant inhabitants, the Anakim, which had made his fellow spies so fearful (Num. 13: 32, 33). What a lesson for us, that nothing is impossible with our God, and that we need not be overcome by our foes.

It was a proof of the fatherly care of our God that he should provide cities of refuge for the manslayer whose offense was not wilful murder. All the names of these cities in their meanings point to Christ. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear" (Ps. 46: 1, 2). How often children of God turn in the time of trouble to some human being for comfort, for direction, for help. And yet God who leads us "by a right way," and who makes all things work together for good to them that love him, alone has the key of the situation. What he has permitted to happen is not that which needs, or can be helped by, human sympathy. To get at the mind of God and know what he is saying to us sheds light upon the darkness, and gives the clue to the labyrinth where there seems to be no way out.

Just at the end of Moses' life he recapitulated the law and called on the children of Israel to renew their covenant with Jehovah. Joshua does the same. In both instances it was like a time of consecration. Both were very solemn. With Moses there was a deep tinge of sadness, for with prophetic eye he saw how his people would fail their God and go into sin and captivity, and perhaps the consciousness of his own failure added to it. But what an overpowering glory must have burst upon him when on the top of Pisgah he saw the land, and so soon saw Him to whom he afterwards bore witness on the Mount of Transfiguration. Joshua's renewing the covenant was brought to a point on the score of idolatry. "Now, therefore, fear the Lord," he says, "and serve him in sincerity and in truth; and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt, and serve the Lord" (Josh. 24: 14). And to bind the people more firmly he called on them to come to a decision openly, and profess whom they would serve. With one consent they all agreed that they would serve the Lord.

Unseen Comfort

A. O. Leonard — INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Invisible Antiseptic Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. I have just gotten out a new Ear Drum that is a great improvement over my original Drum. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. Do not confound this Drum and my method with any failures you may have tried. My Principle is different; my method is also different, and they are the most successful of anything offered for aid to Hearing. It is "Unseen Comfort." My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. Absolutely out of sight when worn. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. I do not make absurd and impossible claims. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

Shall We Know our Friends in Heaven?

No question has more frequently been on the Lips of the Children of Men, especially those who have laid away the Dearest Treasures of their Hearts, than the one which heads this page. Dr. Madison C. A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

King Gustave V. | The Royal Palace, Stockholm, Sweden | The New Queen

SWEDEN'S GOOD KING DEAD

BEFORE the large, plain palace of the kings of Sweden in Stockholm, there was gathered, on Sunday morning, December 8, a great crowd of people. Many of them had stood there quietly since the evening before, though the wind blew shrilly and sent the banner on the palace staff streaming and snapping as if tugging to be free. The air seemed to have come direct from the ice-fields of the frozen north, but cold and wind were little heeded. With anxious, tear-stained faces, the people stood watching the lights that flickered dimly in one of the palace windows. All felt that they could not go home and sleep, for up there one of their best friends—a personal friend each one was sure—the great and good King Oscar, lay dying. Close up to the sentries' beat were crowded the schoolboys of Stockholm. Through the dark night they had waited for tidings of the tall white-haired man who used to stop and kindly ask how they were getting on at school, and who took an interest in their pastimes. Most of the lads were sobbing softly.

At half-past nine in the morning the royal banner dropped foot by foot until it rested in the middle of the banner staff and a groan seemed to break from the very hearts of the multitude, for all knew that the king was dead. A moment later the minute guns boomed from the fortress, carrying the sad news to distant suburbs and villages.

Inside the palace Queen Sophia, the princes and the officers of State prayed by the silent form of the husband, father and ruler. Within an hour a simple memorial service was conducted in the palace chapel, attended by the diplomatic corps. During the morning Prince Gustave took the oath and assumed the title of Gustave V. He adopted the motto, "With the people for the fatherland."

King Oscar's death had been expected for several days; in fact, he had been far from well during the last three years. The friction between the kingdoms of Norway and Sweden, over which he had ruled for so many years, caused him much anxiety. When Norway seceded and started out for herself as an entirely independent kingdom, King Oscar seemed heartbroken and he became constantly weaker. More frequently the reins of government had to be handed over to the Crown Prince, who would act for the time being as regent. The cause of the King's death was given by the attending physician as kidney and heart trouble. It is interesting to note that mourning was almost universal throughout Norway. The ships, government buildings and many private houses displayed flags at half-mast, for the Norwegian people, though severing the political bond, never lost their affection for King Oscar.

When Prince Oscar Frederick was born in 1829, there seemed little prospect that he would ever come to the united throne of Sweden and Norway. His grandfather still reigned, that gallant old soldier who, as Marshal Bernadotte, had fought over the greater part of Europe under the first Napoleon. His father, who became king later under the title of Oscar I., and two brothers, were first in the line of succession. When at last his elder brother became king under the title of Carl XV., Prince Oscar found himself the direct heir. He was known then as the Duke of Ostergothland. He had as instructor during his preparatory studies the famous historian Carson. Then for three years he attended the University of Upsala. He entered the army in 1845, and the next year obtained a much coveted commission in the navy. He spent much of his time in practice cruises and the sea was his delight. He became one of the foremost of Swedish poets, and the poems he wrote at this time are full of the spirit of the vikings and the glories of the Swedish navy. The Prince was a most remarkable scholar, and his poems possessed real merit. He sent one of them unsigned to a national competition and the first prize was awarded to the unknown author.

Prince Oscar was not well enough known to the people to be very popular when he became king, in 1872, but his untiring efforts to promote the welfare of his people soon won their regard to such a degree that he soon became known as the most highly esteemed and best beloved monarch in Europe. He was crowned king of Sweden in Stockholm on May 12, 1873, and on July 13 he was crowned king of Norway, in the venerable cathedral of Dronjeheim. He showed himself to be a farsighted statesman with much tact in handling delicate international questions. He was deeply religious and his private life was an example to all, both high and low, who knew him.

King Oscar has a historical connection with America. In 1896 he was appointed arbitrator in the Venezuela dispute, which caused trouble between Great Britain and the United States. An agreement was made, however, in 1899, in Paris, so that the King's decision was not necessary. As late as 1902 he arbitrated the Samoan claims arising from the disturbances of 1899. When the general treaty of arbitration was being drawn between America and Great Britain, King Oscar was named as final arbitrator, in case those representing the two countries should fail to agree, such was the confidence of all nations in the King's fairness and high sense of justice. During the great famine in Finland and Sweden in 1903, when the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributed a large relief fund, Dr. Klopsch made a personal tour of the famine districts in both countries, and inspected the relief operations. On returning to Stockholm, he was invited to the palace and granted an audience by King Oscar and Queen Sophia, who presented him with their photographs, bearing their royal signatures, in token of their appreciation of American generosity.

In personal appearance Oscar was every inch a king. He had a kindly, yet strong face, finely formed; he was several inches over six feet tall, a characteristic that has been handed down to his sons. The Crown Prince, who has just become King, is blond and of the same great stature, and one of Gustave's brothers is sometimes referred to as "the giant." There are four sons in all: the new King; Prince Oscar Bernadotte; Carl, who is called the handsomest man in Sweden, and Eugene, sometimes called the Red Prince, who has won fame as a painter.

The new King was born in 1858, in the castle of Drottingholm, and in 1881 he was married to Princess Victoria of Baden Baden. In the new King's proclamation to his people he said of his father: "Providence richly endowed that Prince with great and brilliant qualities. His sense of duty, his respect for justice and his love of right, and his unceasing regard for the welfare of his subjects; these were traits of character in the late King which we will all remember with gratitude." It is an eulogy assent to which will be universal from the hearts of all Swedes and of people on both sides of the Atlantic.

Christmas Recollections

TEXT: Luke 2:19—"But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart"

THE life of Mary the Virgin up to the period of the angel's visit had probably been that of the ordinary Jewish girl. In her quiet, uneventful existence there had suddenly come a long succession of wonderful manifestations. One great event came treading upon the heels of another great event, until there seemed to be a great army of them. Why she should be singled out from all the rest of the human race as the chosen one of God, she could not understand. She was only a pure, young, immature maiden. After these manifestations came to her she could not fully appreciate their meaning. But she stored them away in her memory. She treasured them up. Other people may have heard the story of that weary journey from Nazareth to Bethlehem, of the crowded inn and the birth in the stable, and, after a week or two of pity for the young mother, would dismiss the story from their minds. But not so the chief actor in the scene. Mary never forgot any of those scenes which preceded and succeeded the night Jesus was born. The Bible distinctly affirms this. "But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart."

Now, the older we grow the more our present Christmases link themselves to the Christmases that are past. When our children gather about the Christmas tree to get their toys, we think of the time when, with our fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters, we, as children, gathered about the Christmas tree of the old homestead. Thus I would have you join me in a walk through the corridors of the past and talk about the events of many Christmases that are gone, as we try to follow Mary the mother of Jesus when, as an old or middle-aged woman, she lived over the wonderful events which preceded and succeeded the most important of all Christmases, when Jesus as a little child lay in the manger of Bethlehem.

With aching hands and bleeding feet,
We dig and heap, lay stone on stone;
We bear the burden and the heat
Of the long day, and wish 'twere done;
Not till the hours of light return,
All we have built do we discern.

When Mary, as a middle-aged woman, wandered through the sacred halls of memory and pondered over the incidents which preceded the holiest of Christmases, the first event crowding upon her mind and heart must have been the visitation of the angel Gabriel, who announced to her that she was to be the mother of the Son of God. She must again and again have recalled how he looked. She must again and again have lived over that wonderful time when her own innocence and purity were amazed and overwhelmed at the significance of his message. She knew that she was pure in body and in spirit. Yet the strange and marvelous statement was made that she, a virgin, was selected from all women to become the mother of the coming Messiah. Oh, was there ever news more momentous? Was there ever a fact more overwhelming?

The Angelic Visitation

Have you ever tried to picture this angelic visitation? The more I have thought upon this scene the more realistic it has become to me. In the first place, I have always pictured Mary an orphan. Her father and mother are dead. Her brothers and sisters are scattered. She is about seventeen years of age. She has a sweet, pure face. I do not believe even the inspired genius of a Raphael, or a Murillo, or a Botticelli, or a Correggio, have half portrayed the purity and goodness of her countenance. Then I have thought she had a great wealth of black hair and great black eyes. She was at that age when the stranger could not tell whether she was a schoolgirl or a young woman. She was at what is called the doubtful age of womanhood.

Her work of the day is finished. The supper is finished. The dishes are all washed and put away. She goes to her room and shuts the door and is alone. Then I picture her thinking over her past life. She thinks of her mother and father, and wonders how her little brother is getting along. As she thinks of the broken home of her childhood she is sobbing as though her heart would break. Suddenly she looks up. There stands before her a beautiful-faced angel. His garments are of spotless white. He seems to be a man, and yet she knows that he is a celestial visitor. Her great eyes widen in wonderment. Her lips part as though to speak, but she utters not a word. There in the silence of the room she drops upon her knees and cries: "Master, what is it? Hast thou news from my dear ones in the other world?" Then I think the angel reaches forth his hand and touches her and says, "Yes, Mary. My news is from the other world. I bring to thee no message from the dear ones who are gone. I bring to thee a message about the One, the Divine One, who is to call thee mother. The Messiah is soon to be born of thee. The Son of God is to be thy child. And thou shalt call his name Jesus, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Cannot you see her breast heave? Can you not see her cheeks pale with emotion and then flush? Do you think Mary could ever look back upon the scenes of that first Christmas Day without picturing the scene where the angel Gabriel told her that she was to become the mother of the promised Messiah?

The Kindly Joseph

There was another fact which must have weighed on Mary's heart and mind when she thought of the events preceding that first Christmas day. That was the love and the gentleness and the faithfulness of her companion and husband, Joseph the carpenter, who was to her what no other human being was in her time of trial and distress. Whenever she thought of him it was always as the same dear, gentle, kind, loving, faithful husband. When he went to Bethlehem, he could not leave her behind, because her descent from David was more important than his own. Then he did not want to leave her behind, for fear she would not be treated well. Then his gentleness on the journey! In order to make her trip easier, Joseph brought her a donkey to ride. That is the mode of transportation which the poor in the East always use. "But, Joseph," I think I hear Mary say, "you cannot afford to buy that beast for me. Why, in all probability to buy it you sold some of your carpenter tools." "Well," I think I hear Joseph say, "Mary, it is best. You could never walk all that long distance in your present condition. I will be able to pay for him by working a little later at night."

Then, as Mary thinks of all that long journey down to Bethlehem, I think she pictures Joseph as carefully lifting her on the beast of burden. Then when night comes and the camp has to be made, I think she sees him cooking the simple meal and carefully covering her up to sleep in the great warm blanket. He brings her water to drink. Then how careful and anxious he is towards the end of the trip. Yes, Mary could never think of the events which led up to that first Christmas Day without picturing Joseph, the tender Joseph, the loving Joseph, the protector and friend. Yet Mary's remembrances of Joseph are not unlike those we have of our dear ones who, during the merry Christmases, have come and gone.

The Mother's Christmas

Have we not had our faithful Josephs in our past Christmases? How kind and loving some of them have been. There was your mother, the central figure of your childhood's Christmases. How she ever enjoyed those Christmases is beyond us. She used to work so hard to prepare for them that she was more fitted to be in bed than to be moving around and making her happy laugh the loudest of the merry-making. Can't you see her sitting up and sewing? She used to think you were asleep, but you were not. How she ever got so much together for that Christmas tree was a wonder. Talk about geniuses of finance. Why, she could make a dollar go further than any one you ever knew. And then there was your father; and there was your older sister. Don't you remember how she sat down and cried when you found out where some of your presents were kept, and she vowed she would never give you a thing because you went and looked at them? Then as time passed on other figures moved around the Christmas tree. There were your wife and your own babies. Christmas ought to have dear associations for us as it had with Mary. She had her Joseph to brighten that first Christmas morning. We have had our loved ones many years with us to brighten our Christmases in the past and in the present. Better ponder over that fact, my friend. You seem to have a lot to complain about. Better now for a little while ponder over the fact that Jesus hath given to you many dear ones to brighten your Christmas festivities.

But Joseph and the angelic messenger were not the only ones who appeared unto Mary when she thought of that first Christmas day. There was the star in the East and the wise men who came to worship at the manger. And there were all the shepherds. Then there were the angels who sang above the hillside of Judea on the night Jesus was born. All these testified to Mary that Jesus was the Son of God. She could not understand all these mysteries. She did not try to solve them. But she could not shut her eyes to the many which were testified to by those very witnesses. She could not talk of them then, but she stored those testimonies up in her memory. "Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart."

But there was another feeling of gratitude which crept over Mary whenever she thought about the incidents preceding and succeeding that first Christmas morn. That was the thankfulness in her heart, because God had cared for and protected her and her dear family during all those days of trial and ignominy. Never was there a time when God's eye was not watching them, and God's ear listening to them, and God's hand guiding them. Some of us may think that Mary and Joseph were forgotten of God merely because Jesus was born in a manger. But that is not true. God was caring for Mary just the same as God on this Christmas Sabbath is caring for us.

The Divine Protection

But if Mary had her divine protection through the past Christmases, has not God protected and cared for us in the same way during the many Christmases that are gone? Has he not fed you and clothed you and protected you? Has not his right arm always been about you? As with Mary, has not God cared for you in the most mysterious ways? John Knox, the great Scottish reformer, used to tell this wonderful story: For years at the dinner hour he sat at the head of the table with his back to a certain window. One night there was a strange voice of warning bidding him to sit elsewhere and not allow any one to sit in his regular place. Hardly was the meal well under way than a bullet crashed through that window, grazed the chair at the head of the table and buried itself in the candlestick. Had John Knox sat in his regular place that night he surely would have been killed and the Scottish reformation, for a time, at least, would have been halted. At once the Scottish reformer dropped on his knees and thanked God for protecting him and his dear ones. As we look over our past Christmases, like Mary, like John Knox, we can see how God's hand has been guiding and caring for us. Thus the divine protection has been manifested not only in one, but in many, many ways. Can you not, O man, on this Christmas Day, ponder over God's love and care, as did Mary when she looked over the scenes preceding and succeeding that first Christmas Day, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea?

But, lastly, I would turn your attention to one more fact. When Mary thought over the scenes of her past life she certainly must have thought of those persecutions and bitter, heart-rending trials which made her take that journey to Bethlehem, so that Jesus, in fulfilment of prophecy, could be born in the place where David had lived. It was no doubt the bitter and unjust attacks made upon Mary that were the chief causes in preparing the way for Jesus to be born in Bethlehem of Judea. And without doubt it is the misrepresentations and trials of life that are the chief causes of driving us to that same manger. But few of us were ever led to bow and worship Jesus through the sunshine. Nearly all of us have come to him through shadows and storms.

Lost on the Alps

The great Newman Hall, who for many years spent his annual vacations in mountain climbing, used to tell the dramatic story of a Swiss chamois hunter, who was one day crossing the great glacier known as the Mer de Glace. Suddenly, his foot slipped and he fell over the side of an awful crevasse. He only slipped down a couple of hundred feet, but he felt he was lost; for it was an impossibility for him, expert climber though he was, to climb back. Turning his eyes from the top of that mountain of ice, he saw a stream of water flowing down at the foot of the crevasse. He knew he must die if he stayed where he was, so he began to follow that stream, hoping that it might lead him to safety. Slipping here and sliding there and floating in the stream at times, he followed its course. Suddenly, he came to a solid wall of ice under which the river disappeared. He knew he must move on or die. So he plunged into the water and swam as hard as he could through the darkness. After a while, just able to keep afloat, he came out on the other side where were the flowers and the fragrant hay-fields of a beautiful valley. So it is with our troubles. We must go

BRIGHT GIRLS OF MANY NATIONS

By MARY MILLS PATRICK

AMERICAN education in Constantinople is interesting and complex because of the union of many different nationalities in the same institution. In America the problem of dealing with the foreign element is the same yet different. Here the effort is made to transform the foreigner into a true American citizen, without much consideration of his own national ideals. The aim in American education abroad is to combine American ideals with national ideals and inheritance into a symmetrical result in the educated individual. In a word, American education abroad seeks to become a factor in national development.

Constantinople is an appropriate centre for the nations struggling for ascendency in Eastern Europe, Western Asia, Northern Africa, and the beautiful sunny islands of the Mediterranean. On that wonderful bridge across the Golden Horn, uniting Mohammedan Stamboul and the European quarter of Constantinople, representatives from all these nations may be seen in the passing crowds, each showing results, in dress and expression, of the history of the past.

Of these widely different nationalities, the American College for Girls often contains as many as fifteen. Young women come to this college for many different reasons. From Greece, for instance, because attracted by American methods of education, and by the moral and Christian teaching offered by the college; not, however, for the lack of schools in Greece. Greece is a very civilized young country with many of the ideals which it possessed as an old country. The dress and customs which prevail in modern Greece are the same as in other countries in Europe. One regrets the passing of the picturesque national costumes, which are now seen only in the remote villages.

It is not only in Greece and Constantinople, however, that one comes in contact with ancient Greek civilization. The Greeks of Asia Minor and the Islands still hold dear the traditions of ancient glory. One of the graduates of the college is from Mitylene, the home of Sappho the poet, where as long ago as the sixth century before Christ there were regularly organized schools for women for the study of music and poetry. This graduate of the college from Mitylene is at the head of the Princess' Hospital for Children in Athens.

Two Greek Girls

One of the wide fields furnished for educational work is in the Balkan Peninsula. Of the countries in the so-called Balkan Peninsula, Bulgaria is perhaps the most interesting. The American College for Girls has many graduates in Bulgaria, whose high moral and intellectual tone has been a strong influence in Bulgarian society. At one time, there were three members of Parliament and one member of the Cabinet married to girls from this college, and the daughter of the Minister of War and the three daughters of the Assistant Minister of State were among the students.

All the small countries of the Balkan Peninsula make the attempt to establish well-organized systems of education, and most of them have one university each, to which women are admitted.

Servia is perhaps better known here than these other small countries. The American College for Girls received its first Servian student two years ago, and as soon as it has sufficient buildings it will attempt to gain the same influence in education over the women of the other countries of the Balkan Peninsula that it has at present in Bulgaria.

Another country which has greatly influenced the history of Europe and is a strong factor at present in all political changes, is Russia. The college received its first Russian student last year from Novorossisk, at the head of the Black Sea.

A far more complex field for education presents itself, however, in the Asiatic nations living in Turkey, for whom Constantinople is their capital.

More than half of the alumnæ of this college have taught, and several have studied professions, and many are the inspiration of cultured homes. Two are practising physicians—one an Armenian of the class of 1897, Dr. Zarouhi Kavaljian, and the other a Hungarian of the class of 1901, Dr. Amalie Frisch. The American College for Girls at Constantinople is the only college for women in the western Orient. A short time since this college was nearly destroyed by fire, as the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will remember. Notwithstanding the loss of equipment, there are now one hundred resident students, and many are being turned away.

The college has a responsible Board of Trustees, of which Charles Cuthbert Hall, D.D., LL.D., of Union Theological Seminary, is president. The treasurer is Charles H. Rutan, 122 Ames Building, Boston, Mass.

A fund of $500,000 is needed to adequately equip the college to meet all the demands upon it for the education of the women of the East. The president of the college is now in America for the purpose of collecting funds. Her address is Hotel Empire, Broadway and Sixty-third Street, New York.

All gifts to the college will be thankfully received.

through our surging torrents. We must disappear into the impenetrable darknesses. We must have our times of trial, during which we seem to lose sight of God's face. But these times of trouble are the means of bringing us to the manger, as Mary's troubles were the means of bringing her to Bethlehem of Judea, where Jesus was born according to prophecy. Thank God for your troubles, as well as for your pleasant sunshine. He is guiding you with his pillar of cloud, as well as with his pillar of fire, as he guided the children of Israel during the long pilgrimage in the wilderness.

Thus, on this Sabbath preceding our Christmas festivities, you have a great deal more to think about than simply the presents which you are to receive and the tokens of affection you are to give to your dear ones. If you are to spend this coming Christmas aright, you must place alongside of it all the other Christmases of your past life. You must thank God especially for that Christmas when Jesus first revealed himself to you as a personal Saviour. You must thank God that he has surrounded you this Christmas with a great host of people who, like the wise men of the East and the shepherds, are ready to testify to you of his love. You must thank God for your trials and sorrows, by which your heart has been made more tender to him and to your fellow men. It is right when you are thirsty to drink of the water that flows at your feet. But to-day, when we drink of these streams of Christmas joys, we must as wise men look up to the hills from whence these streams come. The birds bathe their wings in the mountain brooks, and as they bathe they lift their voices and sing their praises unto the God who has sent those brooks gurgling down the mountain-sides. So may we lift our voices on this Christmas morn and praise God for all his manifold blessings to us and to our dear ones.

And, friends, if there are any who have not yet praised him, and become one with him, is there any better time than on his holy Christmas Day? I remember years ago, when as a boy I was called to the door. It was Christmas morning. I expected another present was coming. But instead, a young girl came in crying: "Oh, Frank! Papa is dead." Almost in a flash, a friend's life was snuffed out on Christmas Day. We all loved him much. When we went in and saw him, we said, "Could a man go to meet his God on a more beautiful day than Christmas?" Ah, yes, there is a far better use to put Christmas to than this. That is to have our new birth on Christmas. On this day, when all people are preparing to make merry, will you not make it the happiest Christmas Day in all your life? Will you not make it a day when you become one of God's saints by becoming one with Christ? Then, truly I can wish you, who have just given your heart to Christ, and are already his disciple, a Merry Christmas. The bells of heaven are now ringing out a joyful and a triumphal Christmas anthem.

A Fine Christmas Gift

OUR beautiful double page picture, "Take My New Dolly for Christmas," which appears in this issue, is a touching incident from real life which has been reproduced with remarkable beauty and feeling. It is altogether one of the choicest Christmas pictures we have ever seen, and one that would make a most desirable gift for framing. An original gravure of this subject would cost the purchaser at least $10 a copy. Our fine reproduction, printed on heavy paper suitable for framing, will be sent to any address, all charges prepaid, for 25 cents. CHRISTMAS AT THE BOWERY MISSION

At a recent evening service in the Bowery Mission, a census of the audience was taken. To the surprise of many, it was found that the majority were Americans. With most of them, it is the story of the easy road down, from a moral slip to a stumble, a stumble to a fall, a fall to hopeless groveling, and then a pride which keeps them from applying to those who love them best and would be glad to help them. Through the efforts of the Mission many have found their way back to their rightful places, while hundreds more have with help and encouragment won in the battle in the city and made homes of their own. The upward path at times seems somewhat rugged, for the tests surely come; but there are always hands strong to help and a ready forgiveness.

If those who go to a great city for work could only learn, without such hard experience, of the competition, the over-crowding, and the starvation which lie back of the stirring, glittering life, there would be to-day fewer darkened homes and broken hearts.

The plans for Christmas Day at the Bowery Mission are the same as usual this year; the distributing of the baskets in the morning to the families, a dinner for the men at noon, and a service in the evening. Formerly, there was an entertainment for the children; but when one year they filled the streets, thousands strong, and for the time being, literally stopped all traffic, it was deemed advisable to abandon this part of the celebration.

Two things are new at the Mission this Christmastide: the "Brotherhood," and a building farther up the Bowery, which, at the beginning of the new year, will be the future home of the Bowery Mission. The change has been necessitated by the sweeping alterations in the Bowery, consequent upon the demolition of old buildings to make way for the new approach to the Brooklyn Bridge.

The "Brotherhood" is composed of men who came into the Mission one night, and came to stay. These are they who have determined to be better men. Each night they meet in the kitchen, and have a little preliminary service and some helpful talk. Many of them are fighting the drink habit, and every word of cheer, or act of brotherly kindness, helps to make the way shorter and easier. Thus they are strengthened to overcome their own evil habits and to help others.

It was hoped that the Mission might celebrate Christmas in its new home; but so many things had to be considered that the plan was abandoned. The old building will shortly be torn down; but through the courtesy of the contractor, occupancy was allowed until plans could be completed which will permit the moving to the new and larger building without the interruption of the "bread-line" or the Gospel services.

The new location is in the heart of the lodging-house district on the Bowery, where thousands of men are nightly quartered. The enlargement will demand increased funds, and hearts grateful for many blessing will not forget the greatest of all—the blessedness of giving.

In spite of the problems of the winter, there are many grateful hearts in and around the Bowery Mission th Christmas season. There is a woman with a sick husband and several children, who wrote a letter—and was evidently no easy task—to express her thanks for Thanksgiving basket. It furnished, she said, not onl the meal for the day, but part of her Sunday repas There is a young lad, a victim of the opium habit, wh is being helped to overcome it. He has secured pleas ant employment and is winning his battle. There is brave old man, alone and helpless and crippled wit rheumatism, who comes to the Mission nightly an thanks God for his blessings. There is a group of me at the Mission Memorial House who are grateful for home, honest work, and some sure steps taken on thei upward pathway. The Memorial House is planning little modest celebration of its own for Christmas Day There are the officers of the Mission, who are grateful for having been able to secure, after many difficulties the larger home, knowing as they do that more an greater good can now be done.

Finally, there are the workers, who are grateful, thi Christmas Day, for being able to serve in the name o the Master, whose birthday is every day to those wh follow his commands. EUPHEMIA HOLDEN.

To Save the Blind Babies' Home

OUR readers are already familiar with the work of the Sunshine Society among the poor blind babies of New York City. Mrs. Alden, president of the Society, and her associates, several years ago established the Blind Babies' Home, in which a large number of these poor little afflicted waifs have been sheltered and tended, and trained to take an interest in the big world round about them, which they could never hope to see. There has been a debt on the Home, which was in process of being liquidated, but the recent panic shut off contributions, and the Home has suffered greatly. Now the crisis has come. The mortgage is due and all the money has been raised except $400. To raise this every effort has been tried, but without success, and unless help comes before the end of the month, the mortgage will be foreclosed, and the poor little creatures will be scattered—no one knows where.

Perhaps there are some of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who would like to help save the Blind Babies' Home. If so, let them read this letter from Mr. Wolterbeek, a generous-hearted reader, who suggests what appears to be a worthy plan for rescuing the Home.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: I just read in the newspapers that $400 is needed to save the Blind Babies' Home, its mortgage being due December 21. That is abominable, is it not? Of course they will be helped out of their troubles, some way or other. But people are economizing, and I read also in another paper that many economize, in the first place, on their charity gifts. At any rate, this home must be helped and I am sure that many think the same way I do.

I know that there are many people who would be glad to help in instances like this one, if they only knew that about one hundred cents out of the dollar they would contribute went straight to the spot in trouble. I don't believe in always depending on people with bigger purses than mine to help in instances like this one.

Suppose you, through the columns of your CHRISTIAN HERALD, should invite subscriptions to membership of the "Blind Babies' Home Emergency Club." As soon as there are four hundred members, the club is dissolved, and each member receives a medal, on one side of which can be read:

Member of the BLIND BABIES' HOME EMERGENCY CLUB has paid One Dollar to raise the Mortgage, due December 21, 1907, and thereby helped to save this Home.

The membership to be $1.25; the dollar goes direct to the Home for the mortgage and the balance of the 25 cents, after paying for the making of the medals and the postage of forwarding to the members goes also to the Home as a Christmas Gift.

Of course there is some work attached to this, but I am sure you can find some body who will do it without remuneration. I don't know if you approve of the plan and even if you do, I don't know whether your next CHRISTIAN HERALD will not come too late to rescue the Home; but I think that in some way the foreclosure could be delayed if the proper parties would be convinced that the money is in sight and it is in sight when your CHRISTIAN HERALD readers put their shoulders to the wheel. I want to take five memberships as my share in the work.

Yours very truly,
R. DAN WOLTERBEEK.

If 400 names are sent in promptly with $1.25 each as Mr. Wolterbeek suggests, the blind babies will still have a roof over their heads when the New Year dawns. Surely there are few who could resist such an appeal for a Christmas benevolence to the little sightless children—"the least of these." Mr. Wolterbeek has himself taken five memberships in this novel rescue club. Who will take up the remainder? All letters and contributions for this purpose should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, which will acknowledge every gift in its columns.

Pleasing and Instructive

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Have read your premium of "Animal Stories." Am very much pleased with it. A book that will entertain and instruct old and young. You are to be congratulated upon the character of the books you have given as premiums for several years past.

SCHOOL FOR TRAINING EVANGELISTS

Hugh R. Monro
Chairman, Training School Committee

Don O. Shelton
President, National Bible Institute

A STEADILY increasing conviction on the part of leaders in Christian work in New York City that aggressive effort among non-church-goers should be conducted on bolder and more definite lines, has resulted in the establishment and maintenance of several organizations for evangelistic work, carried on largely by clergymen and regularly equipped preachers, aided only in a measure by lay assistants.

The force of workers represented by ordained preachers and missionaries is far from sufficient for the need. It is believed that there should be a corps of trained laymen in each church to supplement the work of the pastor by carrying the Gospel message and invitation to those outside the parish bounds.

To prepare such a corps, to train laymen for intelligent and successful work, a school for the training of the lay evangelist has been established by the National Bible Institute, at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

The school does not propose to furnish a comprehensive course of theological training; it will not qualify men to become pastors of churches; but it does aim to furnish the training which will qualify leaders for Young People's Societies, Young Men's Christian Associations, Evangelistic Meetings conducted by churches, meetings held in missions, in prisons, in public institutions, and in the open air.

The school may safely be called unique. It is unlike anything else in this country. It is a sort of up-to-date revival of the methods pursued by John Wesley in the training of his workers. The aim of the institution will appeal to the overburdened pastors who realize that, unaided, they are unequal to the task of taking the Gospel to those who do not come to hear the message. The opportunity offered by the school will appeal to the devoted, brainy laymen of the church, who can thus fit themselves to give with power and effectiveness their personal testimony to Christ.

"In every city in America are multitudes who do not enter churches to hear the Gospel. In New York City alone fully one and one-half millions of people are unaffiliated with any church. In the Greater Kingdom of America are multitudes of vigorous, intelligent, energetic laymen. In a large degree they are unutilized here in aggressive evangelism. Except by their contribution of money and by their church attendance, most of them are making no direct and personal effort to take the Gospel to the masses outside of the Church.

"That the Christian Church needs reinforcement of aggressive workers is apparent. Vast neighborhoods, even towns in America almost untouched by non-church attendants. It is the duty of the Church to take the Gospel. But how? Not altogether by ordained ministers. They must be supplemented. The task is too gigantic for the corps at present engaged in it. The plan of the National Bible Institute to establish a school for the training of lay evangelists is significant. It indicates the recognition of a need. It promises to supply to the Christian church increased numbers of efficient evangelistic workers."

Among those who will conduct courses of study in the new College for Lay Evangelists are Don O. Shelton, President of the National Bible Institute; Robert E. Speer, Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions; Rev. Dr. David J. Burrell, of the Marble Collegiate Church; Rev. Dr. Charles L. Goodell, of Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. Dr. Arthur T. Pierson, Editor Missionary Review of the World, and a number of others whose experience in Gospel work makes them valuable as instructors.

THE DUPLICATE CHRISTMAS PRESENT

WE hear a great deal in these days of the duplicate wedding gift. How is it about the duplicate Christmas gift? A singular idea seems to prevail that a Christmas present is given in order that the beneficiary may hold it, love, honor and cherish it and forever preserve it, or, at least, personally wear it out with much use. The duplicate wedding present may be disposed of, on condition that another is bought in its place. Even if it is not sold, it may properly be given away. Not so with the Christmas gift.

The absurdity of this position was well illustrated in Mrs. Wilkins-Freeman's well-known and amusing tale of the pink shawls. That a person should feel obliged to cling to a dozen, or even two, gifts precisely alike, just because they are tokens of affection from different people, would seem to be no more binding at Christmas time than on one's wedding day.

There is such a thing as the rare gift, or the last gift, or the gift which comes with an admonition. These, and many other sorts of gifts, are to be sacredly kept. Some of us possess gifts of this description, from which only death shall ever part us. But that one should use needed store-room to keep four white tidies, or six lamp-mats, or several illustrated calendars which happened to come in as gifts at the same holiday time, or on the same birthday, is surely not quite reasonable.

These presumably expressed affection and friendship; but the affection was not in the tidy, or the lamp-mat, or the calendar; it was in the giving. Having once bestowed the present, you have demonstrated your love for your friend. What difference does it make to you what she does with it? If she herself wishes to give a present, and does not need what you have given her, would you not be pleased to have her pass on your little token to another who may need it? The expense and trouble of getting something else are saved to your friend. You ought to be delighted to think that she has been helped by you to this extent.

Some thoughtful givers express this freely, when they are making the presentation. Many of us, especially during these latter days, have found little notes like this pinned to certain pictures or frames or books:

"Very likely you do not need this, or have something like it. If so, pass it on to one of those many friends whom you are always remembering. I only wished to show you that I was thinking of you as of old."

"But," you may say, "what if, like the pink shawls, your presents go back to every one who gave them?"

This might possibly be not a bad thing. Most of us have given away many a pretty trifle, or more important matter, which we very much wished to keep for ourselves. Some stern philosophers maintain that we should never give away anything which we would not much rather reserve for our own personal pleasure. They say it is no generosity to do otherwise.

But, seriously, it is quite worth while to keep a record of the donors of your various gifts. For, in spite of the aforesaid philosophers, it is usually something that we do not want which we give away—and you do not wish to give your friend anything which she has thus proclaimed to be no good.

"But would you be willing to have your friend know that you had given away her present, when she didn't happen to put on it any such generous note as you have described?" If you know that the person would not approve of such a disposition of her gift, you should not give it away. If you feel that she would not mind it you are justified in doing it; and if there should ever be any need of telling her, tell her.

A great deal has been said during recent years against the custom of giving Christmas presents at all. The drain is great upon those in moderate circumstances; it becomes in some cases a form without heart; it promotes extravagance. All of these allegations are true, and yet there is another side, which turns the balance. There ought to be at least one happy day out of the 365 when friends give each other gifts and congratulate each other. What better day could there be for this benevolent ceremony than that which commemorates the birth of Christ? Surely, he transformed the world, and the lands which acknowledge him and keep his birthday are the most favored among nations. Light and love, altruism and fraternity, came in with him, and it is meet that we express in joy and gift-giving our sense of this greatest benefit which humanity has ever known.

Let us give gifts and rejoice upon the coming of the Christmastide. And having given our gifts, let us never inquire what our friends do with that which we have given. We gave the gifts for their pleasure. Now let them take that pleasure in the way most convenient for them.

THE BOY AND THE BIRD
By John Kendrick Bangs

I SOMETIMES think I'd like to be
A bird and live high in a tree;
To soar about the deep blue sky,
And o'er the house-tops gaily fly;
To wing my flight from place to place,
The merest speck in airy space;
With little need
To learn to read,
And labor till my mind grows sick
Of spelling and arithmetic.
And yet, when twilight comes along,
And chilling winds begin their song,
And rattle every window-pane,
And all outside is drenched with rain,
I'm rather glad that I am me,
And not a birdie forced to be,
With ne'er a roof
That's waterproof
To keep him sheltered from the storm,
Tucked in as I am, safe and warm.

I sometimes think, as, skimming low,
Above the lawn the birdies go,
Now swooping down, now soaring high,
That sort of thing I'd like to try;
To chirp and sing the livelong day,
And live a life of constant play;
Forever free
To romp with glee,
And do whatever thing I please,
As careless as the bumble-bees;
And yet when I sit down to sup
At eve, and taste my cambric cup
Of almost-tea and sweetened milk,
With muffins soft as fine-spun silk,
I'm rather glad that I am me,
And not a birdie forced to be,
And eat the fare
Birds everywhere
Indulge in—insects, worms, and such—
I do not like them over-much!

On the Door-Sill of Another Year

THE old year is slipping away and the new year preparing silently to step over the door-sill. We will greet its advent with the ringing of bells and the blowing of trumpets. Every one will be glad in the dawning of the new day.

The old year is well-nigh a finished book. We are turning the last leaf, reading the last word; our sins of omission and commission for that year are almost at an end; if we have erred and strayed like lost sheep, and followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts, we can but leave our confession with Almighty God. Here with the New Year is our chance to begin again. It comes as a white gift from the Father's hand. Unspotted, unstained, our new book lies before us.

In the bank of divine grace, there is a large amount set down to our credit. How shall we use it? What aspirations and endeavors are ours on the threshold of another year?

We cannot lift so much as a corner of the veil that hides the future. This new year may bring us joys or sorrows, losses or gains, fulfilments or disappointments; all must be as God chooses. Therefore, on the will of God we shall pillow our heads, and accept with thankful hearts whatever God appoints.

Let Congress Restore It

IN presenting in this issue the opinions of a large number of our readers regarding the removal of the time-honored motto, "In God We Trust," from the national coinage, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes no apology for devoting considerable space to the topic which is still uppermost in the minds and hearts of many Americans. These letters represent only a portion of the very large number actually received; but they are sufficient to show beyond all cavil the trend of public opinion, which is distinctly averse to the removal of the motto.

It is not necessary here to review the many reasons set forth by the writers of these letters in favor of restoration. Their conclusions are fairly representative of American public opinion as a whole, and these conclusions must be apparent to every fair-minded person.

"A shock to the nation," "a blow at Christian sentiment," "the removal of an honored landmark," "a degenerate step backward," "a national blunder," "a slap in the face of our heavenly Father"—such are some of the expressions which show how deeply our people have been stirred by the effacement of the motto. They feel that a great wrong has been committed in sacrilegiously removing the words which imply national recognition of God's protecting care over our land and people, and that dishonor has been done to the memories of those noble men who, in a time of severe national stress and trial, placed the motto on our coinage.

We note that a measure has already been introduced in Congress for the restoration of the motto. Every loyal American citizen will desire its passage. Let us see to it that we do not falsify history by impiously effacing from our coinage the recognition due to Him to whom we owe all our national greatness, happiness and prosperity.

Health in Winter

ALTHOUGH the winter season, thus far, has been unusually mild, the open weather, while a blessing to the poor, has been productive of sickness in many localities. Affections of the throat and chest have multiplied, and in not a few sections that old winter visitant, grippe, has reappeared and laid many sufferers under contribution.

Care of the health, while needful at all seasons, is especially so in an open winter. At such a time many are apt to neglect even the ordinary safeguards and to expose themselves to sudden changes of temperature while insufficiently clothed or inadequately protected against the chilling and penetrating rains which then take the place of snow precipitation. To all except the strongest, an open winter holds more perils than a normal season, with abundant snow. Unnecessary exposure to cold and wet, overheated rooms, cars that are either stifling or totally unheated, bad ventilation, wet feet—these are the causes that multiply sickness in winter and which invite influenza.

Don't tamper with a cold. Should it happen that you have been careless or exposed, and feel a general physical oppression which has been described as being "sore all over," don't dose yourself with quack nostrums, but stay indoors and send for your family physician. "Grippe cures" and patent panaceas are a delusion. A cosy room, with your home circle around you and the good old family doctor at hand in case of need, are better than all the "cure-alls." With these, and with faith in God and a good conscience, you should be enabled to weather the attack; whereas, if you neglected it, or tried to fight it off unaided, as many do, it might become serious indeed.

A Good King Gone

IT was with genuine sorrow that the world heard that King Oscar of Sweden had passed from all cares of state to his reward. A man of kindly deeds, he seemed always to have the desire to be a father to his people and participate in their joys and sorrows. If a ship went ashore on some remote part of Sweden's or Norway's coast he was one of the first to hear of it, and he would send sympathy to the survivors and material help to the families who had been deprived of their bread-winners. It was one of the beautiful sights of Stockholm to see this king walking the streets of his capital and receiving the truly reverential greetings of his subjects. The universal mourning shows how deeply the Swedish people feel their loss.

Though Sweden stands to one side in the general turmoil of what is termed in Europe "world politics," the statesmanship of King Oscar was such that he was often appealed to to settle international disputes. His decisions were examples of fairness and unbiased judgment. All the courts of Europe could not but admire the pure and lofty character of King Oscar, whose own life was an example to all rulers who had been called to guide the destinies of a people. As one radical writer said, "there could be no complaint found with the monarchical system if kings were all like King Oscar."

The new king has already proved his ability as a wise ruler during the time when he has served as regent during the illness of his royal father. His motto, "With the people for the fatherland," augurs well for the future welfare of Sweden.

Christmas Reveries

GOOD cheer in the home; provision for the destitute near at hand; gifts to friends who are with us, and for those far away, and especially for any who are under the harrow of trouble; presents for the children and companionship in their games—these are the ingredients of a twentieth century celebration of Christmas Day. It is not the time for theological homilies, yet there are surely some who will crave quiet and retirement for a part of the day, perhaps by reason of sickness, or sadness, or advancing age. As they sit alone and meditate, not grudging the young people the jollity and merriment of the celebration, but remembering well the Christmas of other days, they pass a not altogether lonely Christmas. They are visited by the memories of faces that once made up the family picture, but are now lying in the grave or are brightening other homes in distant lands. The associations of the day repeople those silent galleries of the mind and the echo of a joyous laugh that penetrates the silence is not discordant, but actually lends verisimilitude to the reminiscence. It is so like a laugh heard long ago, perhaps is actually the living descendant of that laugh, that it would be no surprise if the door opened and the merry face of the ancestor shone in the light. Or there is a song which the young people are glad to hear; it is so old-fashioned, but it strikes other strings than those of the piano and sends a thrill along the chords of memory, for the listener can remember when that song was new, and whose voice it was that sang it. He is living in the past and there is no season like Christmas for making the imaginary real to him.

Such reveries need not be sad, if faith and hope hold back the curtain. The voice that spoke to Martha at the grave of Lazarus still speaks, and it has taken nothing back. The very survival of the celebration of this day is evidence of its truth. It tells of reunion and promises that the downward path of old age shall not end in darkness, but shall at its close become the gate of life. For the Christian who sits surrounded with the memories of the days gone by, the day cannot be sad. That little Child lying in the manger nineteen centuries ago, came laden with miraculous gifts from the skies. What more cheering and consoling gift did he bring than that of turning the ashes of our regret into the joy of morning? The children do not appreciate this gift now; but he brought gifts they can appreciate. Let them enjoy these; the men and women who have reached the summit and are traveling downward will take this other precious gift which grows more precious as the years pass. He has been our Friend all through, and he will be our Guide and Strength to the end. As we think of him this day we exclaim, Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift!

A Consecrated Gift

IT is not our custom to publish letters from readers who send gifts to the various good causes presented in this journal, but the letter below is so marked by the Christ- spirit, and so full of genuine sympathy with human suffering, that we feel justified in printing part of it at least. The writer is Mrs. B. J. S. of Linoln, Del.

NOVEMBER 25.

Dear Brother in Christ: Enclosed find twenty-five cents for the Bowery Mission. I am a poor, sickly, homeless woman, without any means to earn my living and without an income—do not know where I shall find shelter, food and heat this fast approaching winter. But I want to help those poor souls of the Bowery Missoin, for they are every one of them so very dear to God's heart that I know that great heart of love is pained to see their distress. Poor, homeless and wretched as they are, God loves them, and I love them, and all who are filled with God's spirit must love them. Please give them my love, and tell them for me that God the Father loves them, and so does His Son, Jesus Christ, and that God and Christ are longing for their love in return, longing to save them. Poor and miserable as they are, they can give joy in heaven by accepting Christ as their Saviour.

Although I am homeless and too weak to earn my own living, and have no earthly one to lo look to my needs, I can clearly read the Bible where it says that it is "more blessed to give than to receive," and that "they who give to the poor, lend to the Lord" who pays "some thirty some sixty some an hundred-fold."

To Aid the Miners' Wives and Orphans

1801 P STREET, DUPONT CIRCLE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: The Red Cross has announced that it will receive and carefully administer any funds that may be sent to it in behalf of the widows and orphans of the fearful mine disaster at Monongha. I am wondering if perhaps you would emphasize this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and receive contributions for this fund. It seems to me, at this Christmas time, perhaps people's hearts might be moved by the sorrow there. I am sending my own little offering of $25. Very truly yours,

MRS. F. S. BOARDMAN.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will receive and acknowledge any contributions in aid of the widows and orphans of the victims of this terrible disaster—probably the saddest of its kind our country has ever known. All funds so contributed will be forwarded to the Red Cross for distribution. Dr. Klopsch, the Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has sent his check for $250 in aid of the sufferers.

Entombed in a Mine

ONE of the saddest mining disasters our country has ever known occurred at Monongah, W. Va., on December 6. Shortly after the day force of 380 miners had gone down the shafts of mines Nos. 6 and 8 of the Fairmount Coal Company, a terrific explosion was heard. Huge boulders of rock and coal were loosened in the other mines, and from the mouths of the two shafts where the accident happened, shattered timbers and a cloud of coal dust were blown out with such force that some of the wreckage was flung across the river. As soon as the alarm had subsided, rescuers attempted to descend the shafts of the wrecked mines, but it was soon discovered that the effort was hopeless. Five men, badly injured, were taken out of the debris, where they were probably caught by the explosion while descending to work. Seventy-eight dead bodies were also recovered; but all attempts to penetrate to the depths below, where more than 350 miners were buried in a living tomb, had to be abandoned.

Opinions differ as to the cause of the disaster, but it is generally believed that some miner, in setting off a blast, had ignited an accumulation of the deadly gas known as "black damp," which in turn ignited the coal dust, the latter being known and dreaded in all the West Virginia mines as a highly inflammable substance. This powerful explosive had evidently made a complete wreck of the subterranean passages of mines 6 and 8, as the heavy timber props which supported the roof of No. 6 were shattered and torn, while the entry, 300 feet below the surface, was jammed with the wreckage of cars, electric motors and timbers. Among this debris the first dead bodies were found, some of them too tightly wedged to be removed. There was a hope—though a faint one—that the rescuers, when they reached the lower levels, might possibly find some who had been able to escape to some remote part of the mine, where the purer air would sustain life till help came; but it was generally feared that all below had perished. A large corps of expert rescuers under direction of Chief Mine Inspector Paul of West Virginia, were speedily at work, but the mangled condition of the bodies recovered forbade the sorrow-stricken women and children, who had gathered at the mouth of the mine, to indulge the hope of ever again seeing their loved ones alive. Many distressing scenes took place among the crowds of weeping relatives. Estimates differ as to the number of victims. Manager Malone says that on the morning of the disaster 478 miners were checked off as entering the shaft. Others affirm that the number was 406. How extensive and how dire are the results of such a calamity! Violent death, bereavement and destitution flow from an act that may have been due to a moment's forgetfulness of the usual precautions. But natural law makes no excuses. The careless man may do as much mischief as this criminal. The fact teaches us to be careful in every sphere of life lest we injure ourselves and others.

A Canine Heir

The question whether a dog can inherit money was submitted to a court in San Francisco, Cal., recently. A man in Redwood City, who died six months ago, left a will in which he bequeathed a thousand dollars to a favorite fox terrier. The interest of the money was to be applied to providing food and care for the animal, and he directed that his sister, who was an executrix to his will, should see that the money was expended for that purpose. The novelty of the bequest was an obstacle to proving the will, and finally it was thought wise to have an authoritative judicial opinion on the subject. Judge Coffee, who presided when the case was argued, decided that the dog could not inherit, and ordered the bequest to be carried to the residuary account. The sister, however, undertakes to see that her brother's wishes are respected and will take care of the dog as long as he lives. A human being would regret the loss of the legacy, but the dog does not understand. His present owner will love him for her brother's sake and he is not likely to lack food and comfort. Sisterly affection, as he will find, is a better guaranty than an invested legacy. It is much to be wished that the poor disciple always found it so in his case.

For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward. (Mark 9 : 41.)

A Mystery of the Sea

The arrival at Bluff Harbor, New Zealand, early this month of the survivors of a shipwrecked crew, solves the mystery surrounding the fate of a long-missing vessel. The Dundonald, a large steel sailing vessel of more than two thousand tons, sailed from Sydney, New South Wales, in February, for Falmouth, England. She should have reached that port in June, but nothing was heard of her, and last month she was given up by her Scotch owners as a total loss. It was supposed she had been sunk at sea by collision with another vessel or with an iceberg. The actual facts are now told by sixteen emaciated men who formed part of her crew. They say that when the vessel was in the neighborhood of the Auckland Islands she experienced heavy gales, and after a hard struggle, she was driven ashore on an uninhabited island. Some of the crew were drowned in the wreck. The survivors erected a shelter with parts of the broken ship and then set out to explore the island. They found a spring of fresh water to which they owe their lives. There was little of an edible character in the vegetation, and their main reliance was on shellfish. Several more of the crew died from insufficient food and exposure, and finally only sixteen of the sturdiest were left. It was not until they had been nine months on the island that their signals were seen by a passing steamer, which took them to Bluff Harbor. They would not need to listen to sermons or lectures to induce them to go. The fact that deliverance from hardship and starvation was offered them was enough, yet men and women over whom a worse fate is impending, are persuaded with difficulty to accept the salvation freely offered.

How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation? (Heb. 2: 3.)

A Belated Letter

A letter-carrier went on board of the revenue cutter Manhattan one day last week, asking if there was a man named Tom Neilsen among the crew. Neilsen responded and the letter-carrier handed him a letter from Norway, which had been mailed to him [illegible] years ago. It had been addressed to him at Montevideo, Mexico, and had arrived there shortly after he left that city. He was then captain of a tramp vessel which went to various ports as it found a cargo. The letter had followed him twice around the world, always reaching a port by some strange coincidence after he had left that port. In the course of his voyage he had picked up mail at various places, but had always missed this particular letter. It was written by his brother at Grantstadt in Norway, and contained an enclosure by his wife. The front and back of the letter were covered with addresses to ports in Asia, Africa, and America. The captain having sailed away from these ports before the letter arrived, it was sent again on its journeys. The captain smiled as he read the letter. It contained home news, and among other matters, told him of the birth of a child and described the new-born infant. That baby is now a stalwart man as big as the captain himself. The letter therefore considered as news was of no value, but the captain was pleased to get it, nevertheless. It showed him that his wife and relatives had not forgotten him in their home cares, but were thinking of him and loving him when he was on the other side the earth. He knows it now, though he may have doubted at the time the letter failed to reach him thirty-two years ago. The Christian will get such evidence, when, in the clearer light of heaven, he surveys his life here. He will learn that God never forgot him even in the times when he appeared to be silent.

In a little while I will [illegible] face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee. (Isa. 54 : 8.)

A TOUR AMONG GENTLE SAVAGES

The Strange, Shy Kamasai Tribes and Their Peaceful Village Life

WHILE away on a trip into the country northwest of our mission stations, where the Gospel has never been preached to the people, there came to my office at Kijabe, a list of the contributors to the mission for the past six or seven months, and among others I find THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S offering for the general fund of the mission. When starting on a hurried trip to visit some of our mission stations among the Akamba, the tribe where our work first commenced, I slipped this list into my box, and so find it here as I am trying to get off some letters while delayed at Kangundo, the old headquarters of the mission.

In thanking you, very heartily, for your gift and for your general interest in our work, my thoughts have gone back over your many kindnesses, in publishing accounts of the work from the sailing of the first party in 1895 on to the terrible famine in 1899, when, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, considerable sums of money were contributed to save those who were perishing by the thousands in British East Africa.

I am sure that you will be interested to know that our work has rapidly grown of late. After a brief visit to England and America last summer, eight new workers and four missionaries, who had been home on a furlough, came out with me. Since then, nine new missionaries have arrived, and our latest advices from Philadelphia, state that nine others are either on the way or soon to sail from New York. Our hearts are filled with joy because of these reinforcements. The work is better organized than ever before. The conditions and needs of the people are better understood, and the experimental stage of the work has merged into one of tried and approved methods.

During the last six months, a marked interest has been shown among the people where we are working, and many have declared their faith in Jesus Christ. A few, enough to form an earnest little native church, have been publicly accepted, while many others are in classes for the study of the Word of God, that we may be sure they fully understand what it means to walk with God.

This increase of converts has brought to us new problems. The national sin of the people is indolence. The conditions which surround them in their own homes are evil beyond all description; whole families are rarely led at once into the Christian life, and individuals are often cast out from their families, threatened with severe physical violence, and become, essentially, outcasts from their homes and tribes if they live really Christian lives. We are therefore undertaking, as far as our limited means will permit, the industrial training of our converts and earnest young men who are awakening to some sense of their need. It is our purpose to make this Industrial School a place for the most thorough training, where each student, when he leaves the Institute, shall have not simply a few ideas about some trade, which will fill him with conceit without competence, but such a mastery of some trade as shall make him absolutely independent and self-supporting, with clear ideas of right living and the dignity of honest toil. Through friends who have been in the country and have seen the need, we have been able to secure a tract of land for the Industrial School, at the headquarters of our mission. To this school, the earnest, capable young men and women from the different stations are being gathered, to be taught how they may live industrious, Christian lives.

Seven stations have thus far been opened, among three different tribes—the Agikuyu, Akamba and Masai. Workers are now on the field ready to open two other stations as soon as they have secured such command of the language as will enable them to work among the people. A friend from New York, who is now in the country and has studied our work, has offered to open a new station along our line of advance to the northwest. It was the hope of Rev. Peter Cameron Scott, the founder of the mission, and of those who were associated with him in the beginning of the work, that a chain of stations might reach away into the interior, among wholly unevangelized tribes, and that from this line, to the right and left, native evangelists might carry the message to an ever-widening field, until all the tribes of Central Africa have heard the Gospel. Already some earnest young men are in training for this native evangelism. It is our belief that each one, even of these evangelists, shall have such a knowledge of a trade as shall make him useful, and perhaps self-supporting, among the people to whom he goes.

A Njamus Family and Their Home

The Royal Commissioner, who was appointed a year ago, is much interested in this work, and has offered me any assistance in his power. Recently, when with wife and son he visited our headquarters station at Kijabe, he expressed his hearty approval of the work, and his great pleasure at the progress being made. The recent trip into the new country to the northwest, of which I have spoken, has opened to our vision six tribes who are wholly without the Gospel; no missionary, no Bible, not a Christian or a ray of Christian light, save such as we were able to present through interpreters in a hurried trip among a few of them. The Kamasia people, half agricultural and half pastoral, closely related to the wild, warlike Masai, occupy a range of hills to the west of Lake Baringo, and it is our hope to plant there, first of all, two or three strong stations. The funds for one of these has been promised by the gentleman of whom I have spoken.

Njamus Men Gambling

Down in the low, unhealthful region south of Lake Baringo, there are two large villages, where the people are more closely congregated than in many of our cities at home, a tiny hedge of dry thorn branches being the only separation between many little clusters of houses. Near one of these villages of seventy families, averaging ten to a family, my daughter and I stayed for several days. One day we visited forty families in one village. Few better opportunities could be found in the country for constant missionary work. The people do very little cultivating, and remain idly about the village all through the day, occupied in dressing sheep or goat skins, which are used for clothing, the men playing games, chiefly gambling, though with such trifling stakes that no property is lost or won, the young men occupying themselves with the ornaments for their bodies, or going out with the young women to their wild native dances. Great numbers of little children could easily be gathered here for a most profitable and fruitful work. One bright-faced little fellow we found tied by a long string from his ankle to the centre post of the hut, where his mother was busy at work preparing food for her family.

These people received us kindly, sat and listened with wonder to the strange story of God's love, which they had never heard from human lips before, and asked us if we would not stay and live with them and teach them all these words. At first the young women were so shy that neither my daughter nor myself saw any for several days; then, seeing that we were peaceably inclined, they began to peep out of their huts like strange, wild animals; but if we came too near, they were gone like a flash into hiding, we could scarcely tell where.

At one village of forty-two families, one could easily stand in the centre and throw a stone outside of the village, so closely are they packed together. Their huts are built of bent sticks, put in the ground in a circle ten or twelve feet across, bent together at the top, daubed with mud up two or three feet from the ground, and then thatched to the centre. Some of them are built up four or five feet from the ground and then the thatch roof put on. An excavation is made, twelve to eighteen inches down, for their floors, and sticks are laid across at the beginning of the thatch roof, so that it is practically a two-story house. Over these sticks they place skins, and the men have all their treasures kept there—bows and arrows, spears and shields, feathers for body decoration, etc. These people are called the Njamus which is also the name of their two villages. Little Njamus, which I have described, is much the smaller of the two; Big Njamus being probably five times the size of this village. The people speak the Masai language, with but very slight variations, although they own no relationship to that tribe. They own thousands of cattle and sheep and many donkeys, and at evening time, when the herds come in from the wide, level plains about, where they have been feeding, it is a marvelously interesting sight; men, women and children come out of the village to watch their friends coming back with the flocks and herds, and the scene is one of intense life and animation.

Should the district prove too unhealthful for continuous effort, workers could at least spend the dry season among these people, and retire to the Kamasia Hills, only one or two days' journey distant, to regain the needed health and strength for the months of work on the lower plain, and while there could help in the work among the Kamasia people. Their languages are so nearly the same that workers would find but little hindrance.

In addition to these, the wild Assambur tribe, but little known even among explorers, are only two or three days to the northeast of our station among the Masai; while to the northwest of the Kamasia, reaching along the high hills which stretch away to the Nile, the Suk, Karamojo and Turkana tribes still await the coming of some messenger of God, brave enough and loving enough to reach out with the message of life to these who are perishing without hope.

In the Market-Place, Cartagena

AMONG OUR COLOMBIAN NEIGHBORS

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

COLOMBIA is quite near to the United States, nearer than any other South American country; yet it is an almost unknown neighbor, lying as it does across the Gulf of Mexico, with its long stretch of coast on the Caribbean Sea.

I got pretty well acquainted with the country and learned something of the people during several months of travel. It is not an easy country to get into or to get out of, but the ways in and out are very interesting. For the traveler who is interested in historic memories, the best place from which to undertake a journey to the interior is Cartagena. It has a fine harbor, with ships from the United States and Europe two or three times a week; but that isn't what makes a visit to Cartagena so pleasant. It was the fortress and stronghold of Spain for centuries, and the Spaniards built one of the most wonderful of all the great cities which marked their conquest of America. Cartagena was notable for the wall which surrounded it, which was built to keep out pirates and to keep off other Christian nations, such as England, whose navigators, in those days of freebooting, were little less than pirates, though they held commissions from the great monarchs, just as the Spanish buccaneers held commissions from their sovereigns. The wall was partly built by slave labor. No one to-day knows what the cost was, but estimates place it at $60,000,000 (gold), in a period when $60,000,000 was equal to $200,000,000 in the present day.

Cartagena was the city of the Inquisition when that awful institution was at the summit of its power, and prelates and brave soldiers and powerful statesmen all trembled at its behests. The building the Inquisition occupied is standing to-day, though part of it was rebuilt in the eighteenth century. It is now a very extensive warehouse, with the upper floors occupied as a dwelling by a wealthy Colombian merchant.

The present city of Cartagena is not so large as in the colonial days, having a population of only twenty-seven thousand, whereas it once had more than fifty thousand. It is peopled by a varied mixture of those of pure Spanish descent and of mixed African and Spanish blood. All these classes may be seen on a market day, or almost any time, in the streets. There is one very curious custom followed in Cartagena by the young people who are in love and who are acknowledged sweethearts. This is the use of the deaf and dumb alphabet. At almost every turn a young man may be found standing in the street making all the signs of the alphabet with his fingers, while from the grated window of a balcony above a dark-eyed girl is smiling on him.

Real enjoyment is to be found in a voyage up the Magdalena River—eight hundred miles—if one cares to go that far. The lower river usually is filled with hyacinths which have been torn from the banks by the current; and these make a very pretty effect—sometimes spreading like a green carpet over the entire surface of the water. The stern-wheel boats which carry passengers and cargo up the Magdalena take from ten to fourteen days to reach Dorada, six hundred miles distant, which is the end of deep-water navigation—deep water in this case being for boats which do not draw more than three and a half feet. There are many wayside villages and stations where wood is taken on for use as fuel; but after the first hundred miles or so all of these settlements lie right on the edge of the tropical jungle. When the boats tie up at night one can hear the night songs of the birds and the calling of the monkeys. In the daytime, the alligators which crowd the sand-banks are the most diverting sight and occupy the attention of passengers, who shout to them until they move their lumbering bodies clumsily into the water.

I was much interested in the public schools at Honda. As early as six in the morning I was awakened by what seemed to be the buzzing of countless swarms of bees, but looking out of the hotel window into an adjoining yard, I found it was the school pupils. Six o'clock seems pretty early to open school, but it is done in the hot countries. There were forty or fifty lads, some of them seated on mats or rude benches in the schoolroom, and others walking about, but all of them conning their lessons aloud. They did not seem to interfere with one another or to bother the teacher, who appeared to be watchful of them all and to see that their lessons were not only learned but recited. There was also a girls' school, where I heard the same buzzing. But a little later in the morning, when quiet came, I looked into the girls' schoolroom and found they were all engaged in embroidery and needlework.

Reading aloud is a very common habit in Colombia. On the boat I noticed the frequency with which a group would gather around some one who would read from a book or a newspaper, but occasionally there would be a passenger off in a corner by himself, yet reading in a high monotone. After looking in on the Honda schools, I understand how it came about. The habit of reading aloud is acquired in childhood, and very few people break away from it when they are men and women.

There are American schools in Barranquilla and Bogota, and one or two other places in Colombia, which are conducted in connection with the American churches. Different methods are followed in these schools, yet they do not entirely break away from the Colombian customs.

The mule journey from Honda to Bogota, or rather to the station, where a short railway line may be taken for Bogota, occupies from two and one-half to three days. In the first part of the journey, it is up and down and down and up, sometimes passing pack-trains of a hundred mules loaded with all kinds of freight and sometimes waiting for them to pass in the opposite direction. Women and children make the journey on saddles specially provided for them. There are many splendid mountain views, with snow summits in the distance, and many grand canyons and gorges to be seen; but when night comes and one stops at the little wayside inns he is apt to have had enough of the scenery for that day. The afternoon of the second day, when the climbing is all up and still higher up, the mountain gorges are especially fine; but the great satisfaction is in reaching the plateau and in urging the mule to a steady lope along a fine level road to the railway station.

President Reyes[x] and a Party of Provincial Colombians at Bogota

Bogota is one of the most remarkable capitals in the world, hedged in as it is by mountain peaks and reached after so many difficulties. The early Spaniards planted a city there, which was their seat of government and of ecclesiastical authority. It is to-day a very fine type of the partly modern Spanish-American city. There are no grand edifices, though the cathedral is imposing, and there are a number of very interesting old Catholic churches. There are also some fine little plazas or parks and many comfortable homes. Bogota is situated in the centre of a plain which is a mass of green vegetation most of the year. The ripening grain-fields are very beautiful. The people of Bogota are among the most cultured in South America.

The present President of Colombia is General Rafael Reyes, who is at once a scholar, a soldier, a scientist, and a statesman. He speaks five or six languages. He won renown as a scientist and explorer when, as a young man, he and his brothers, Nestor and Enrique, explored the Colombian rivers which are tributary to the Amazon, and followed the Amazon down to its mouth at Para. His brothers perished in this exploration, and the Pan-American Conference held in Mexico some years ago, of which General Reyes was a member, arranged to have a tablet erected commemorating the brothers. This has been placed in the cathedral. General Reyes is giving Colombia a progressive administration, trying to build up its commerce and industries, and to insure peace and national prosperity.

American Magazine

IS turned out by the most illustrious group of editorial workmen that has yet been assembled to make a magazine. Toiling together with heart and soul and mind, they write the best that can be written, and get from other pens the best that can be gotten—literature that lives and breathes and spurs to better living—illustrations that are true to life and nature.

They are John S. Phillips, editor-in-chief, formerly of McClure's Magazine; Ida M. Tarbell, F. P. Dunne ("Mr. Dooley"), Ray Stannard Baker, Lincoln Steffens and William Allen White.

Mr. Dooley will appear exclusively in every issue of The American Magazine in 1908—that's reason enough for adding it to your list.

Cosmopolitan

NO matter how many magazines you take, Cosmopolitan is the one you cannot afford to do without. Its subscribers of last year are subscribers this year—with their friends. They'll be subscribers next year—with their friends' friends. This, after all, is the real test of a magazine's merit—that its readers tell their friends about it. You can be sure that in 1908 one feature in each issue will be of such universal interest as to dominate the magazine world for that month. As single instances, take Cosmopolitan's great series of brilliant short stories by Oppenheim, or the remarkably popular "Wolfville Tales" of Alfred Henry Lewis. "The best—no matter what it costs," is the motto which makes Cosmopolitan resemble no other magazine but Cosmopolitan.

Good Housekeeping

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING is a richly illustrated magazine for all the family. It is, moreover, the most practical of the household magazines, and at the same time one of the brightest, most refreshing periodicals for general reading. It tells not how things should be done, but in a breezy way how they have been done by clever people. It is woman's best resource in the daily perplexities of home management, and is the court of ultimate appeal for things domestic. In a word, it is a cheery, helpful companion for the entire household, for it is the meeting ground of hundreds of practical, inspiring writers. It is issued monthly and reaches no less than a million readers. Whatever magazines you take, Good Housekeeping should be one of them.

Harper's Bazar

FOR forty-one years Harper's Bazar has been the leading American authority on fashion, good form, and entertainment. It will continue to be an invaluable household guide and assistant.

Harper's Bazar is made for all refined American women. Such women are its most ardent admirers, whether their incomes are large or small, whether their scale of living is simple or complex, whether they dwell in towns or in the country.

Harper's Bazar preaches economy—rational domestic economy—and wise spending. Harper's Bazar preaches simplicity—the simplicity of sane, wholesome, rational living. Harper's Bazar preaches progress—progress in the kitchen, in the nursery, and in every other home department.

Ever Popular Holiday Gifts

Search wherever you may, you will never find anything that, at the price, gives greater and more genuine satisfaction as a Holiday gift than a weekly or monthly magazine, which the whole year through periodically reminds the recipient of the thoughtfulness of the giver.

Little Folks

A BEAUTIFULLY illustrated monthly magazine for young children. Mothers and fathers who wish to provide the very best reading and pictures for their young children, that will be read and re-read, and looked at and looked at, welcome Little Folks. It is a story-teller, a picture book, a playfellow, an out-of-school magazine. Its fun is of a simple, sunshiny sort. Its little tales of children possess an ethical value—they stimulate their readers and hearers to be fearless, cheerful, unselfish, and above all true and honorable. All stories of a painful kind are excluded, especially such as would haunt nervous and imaginative children. There is much curious and interesting natural history, also play-work for little fingers.

McClure's Magazine

THE Magazine in a vast country like the United States—where the dimensions are those of a continent—has an influence almost unlimited. It reaches as many thinking people on the west coast as on the east, in the South as in the North. The Paris press controls France; the London press controls England; but only the magazine is big enough to reach all America—such a field is beyond the scope of the greatest daily ever published.

McClure's Magazine was the first periodical to realize this great responsibility, and the first to make the monthly periodical a vital influence in good government and good citizenship—an instrument to help a great, wide-spread people understand itself and its possibilities.

Pearson's Magazine

DESTRUCTIVE journalism has had its day. Fair-minded conservatism is now having its inning. For almost two years Pearson's has been consistently constructive in its editorial policies. Now there have come to be imitators; but Pearson's remains—the leader.

In fiction, too, Pearson's has its distinctive quality. It is famous everywhere as the creator of Captain Kettle, Monsieur A. V., Don Q., Randolph Mason and Captain Romaine.

A novelty feature for the coming year is a light sociological study in verse, entitled "The Seven Stages of Unrest," by Carolyn Wells, exquisitely illustrated by Wallace Morgan—the creators of the famous "Fluffy Ruffles."

Review of Reviews

IN the coming Presidential election year, with its tense interest in the trusts, the tariff, the railroads, politics generally and political personages, the Review of Reviews will be doubly valuable to you. With Dr. Albert Shaw's monthly "Progress of the World"; with the cartoon history of the month; with the timely contributed articles on just the questions you are interested in; with the gist of the really important articles of all the other magazines of the world served up to you, and the reviews of new books—you can keep intelligently up with the times at a minimum cost of time, effort and money.

In the Review of Reviews you not only get the best informed, most timely and useful magazine in the world, but you also get over and above all the other periodicals, or just the part you need.

Success Magazine

THE investigation by Success Magazine of the opium curse in India, China and Japan, and of the responsibility of Great Britain and British traders for its extension against pitiful protests of the Chinese Government, who foresaw the inevitable demoralization of all classes of their people—forms the strongest, most important and most far-reaching work done by any American magazine for many years. Success has spent nearly $10,000 in making this investigation, sending Samuel Merwin—its special representative—for a six months' residence in the Orient for this purpose; and the first of this series of articles appears in Success for October, 1907. Also the beginning of "Lentala"—a new serial story of adventure—and the first of several articles on "The Real Thomas W. Lawson."

Woman's Home Companion

THE Woman's Home Companion gives to its readers each month as much good fiction as the story magazines, as much first-class art work as the picture magazines, more authoritative articles of interest to women than any other publication, and in addition a complete magazine of helpful departments, serving every practical need of the American woman.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale retains his position at the head of the Companion's editorial staff. Mrs. Sangster, Jack London, Madame Nordica, Paderewski, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, whose greatest novel is just beginning in the magazine, and the author of Eben Holden, are a few of the distinguished contributors to the 1908 Companion.

World To-Day (The)

THE only magazine of its class sold at a popular price. The World To-Day is a monthly world review, but is not made up of clippings of other publications. It obtains its information from original sources, and is reliable and up-to-date. Its contributors are the foremost men and women of the day. The reader will find in it recreation for the idle hour, and best of all—something worth while. Many illustrations are in colors. All other magazines of its class sell at $3. The World To-Day is but $1.50. Its remarkable quality and low price make it an exceptional bargain, and we recommend it strongly to our readers.

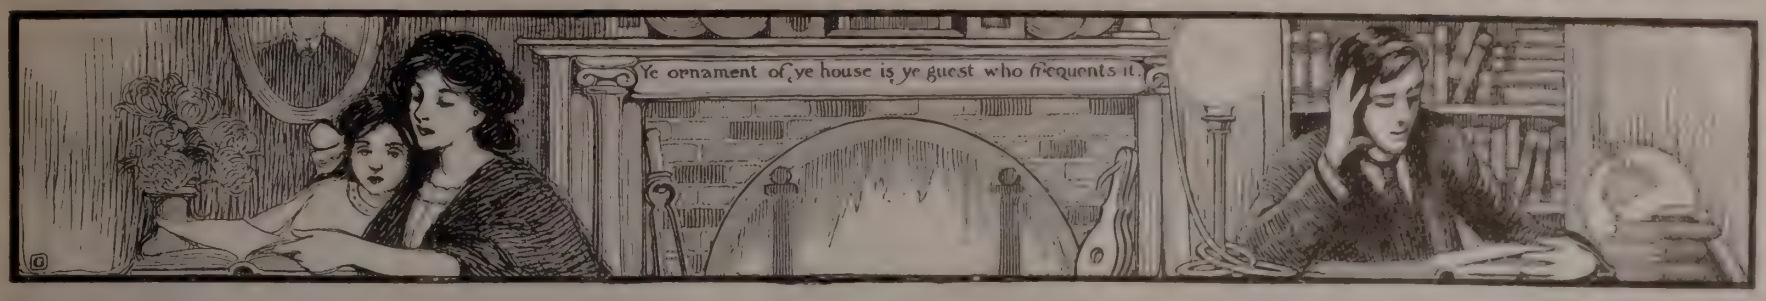
AROUND KRIS KRINGLE'S TREE



By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE isn't in the whole round year a time so happy for the children at home as the time that comes just before Christmas. For days together little fingers are busy making gifts for father and mother, little savings-banks surrender their contents, so that unselfish children may buy pretty toys for little friends and cousins, and the air is simply full of mysteries and secrets. When you see two or three bright heads in a corner you may as well avoid asking questions, and if you happen to overhear a word or two never meant for you, you must act quite unconsciously, and neither show by word nor sign that you have learned anything the children were trying to conceal. Christmas Eve is the merriest time of all, for then Kris Kringle's tree, with its fruit of loving gifts and its starry twinkling tapers, focuses the excitement of the household. The children hold their breath when the room is darkened, and suddenly as father lights the tapers the wonderful tree becomes a blaze of glory.

A PEEP AT THE TREE

Come look at the boughs so sparkling and bright.
'Tis the prettiest tree that was ever in sight.

There were apple and pear trees in the orchard last summer, peach trees and plum trees, and they were beautiful from early spring till harvest; but after all they could not compare in the children's eyes with the splendid tree that comes into the home just once a year.

Almost to the children it seems like a miracle, and as, one by one, they receive the surprises that love has planned, they understand better than ever what joy and gladness the dear Lord brought into the world. For it is to the Christ-child who was born in Bethlehem nearly two thousand years ago that we owe Kris Kringle's tree, and every bit of the happiness that belongs to childhood. Just as the little brother or sister lies in the mother's arm and is held close to her breast, so the Christ-child was cradled in the arms of his fair young mother, while she sang soft lullabys above his little head. Look up at the sky on Christmas Eve, and you will see millions and millions of stars, far too many to be counted, shining in their magnificence in the blue vault of heaven. When our dear Lord took on him the form of a little child, a door swung open in the heaven that is far above the stars, and forth through that golden portal swept a mighty train of angels who had an errand to this earth of ours. In the solemn midnight centuries ago the shepherds heard them singing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

All over Christendom and in many of the far lands of the East on Christmas Eve, 1907, children will sing around Kris Kringle's tree, and their voices will be only a refrain of the song the angels brought from heaven.

Somehow the children and the tree belong together. Therefore, if we cannot have a tree in our home for every child in the neighborhood, shall we not help along with the Sunday School trees, the trees in the Settlements and in the children's hospitals? If Christmas means anything it means that nobody shall be left out of the general good will. There are dear little ones whose homes are dark and cheerless in this winter of hard times; children whose parents have much ado to provide the daily bread, and who cannot possibly afford dolls and sugar plums and other luxuries for their boys and girls. Can we not help to send Christmas cheer to such as these?

JUST A GLIMPSE

Puss-cat Mew, come and see;
Is there something for you on the Christmas-tree?

The Ethics of Shopping

A great many women enjoy shopping for its own sake, for its agreeable excitement and the pleasure they have in looking at new goods and new fashions. They start out for a day of shopping with the spirit of adventurers setting sail for unknown seas, or of explorers starting out to visit unknown lands. Without any definite idea of making purchases or with the intention of actually spending twenty-five or fifty cents, there are women who pass a whole forenoon or afternoon in going the rounds of big department stores, looking at the goods displayed and ruthlessly giving trouble to weary clerks and saleswomen who are compelled to be civil and to show the wares of the merchant to people who may or may not be buyers. It makes no difference that the experienced saleswoman can tell at a glance that the woman at the other side of the counter has not the remotest intention of making a purchase; it is her business to show the goods and show them she must. While the provident buyer is perfectly right in taking pains to find precisely what she wants, and is therefore privileged to go from shop to shop until she is satisfied, there is no excuse for the one who simply uses shopping as an easy method of killing time.

Before setting out on a shopping expedition a woman should know very nearly what she wants and how much she is willing to spend. Provided with a shopping list she may save time, strength and temper by going methodically from counter to counter, crossing off each item as she succeeds in supplying her need. If she is looking for gloves she should know approximately the color and length she wants, and in the larger establishments she should go through the process of having her gloves tried on. A great deal depends as to the fit of a glove on the manner in which it is first fitted to the hand, and the young women who sell gloves know just how to coax them on, so that they will fit to perfection ever after. Although this is part of their obligation, a lady does not forget to thank them for the trouble.

Indeed, entire politeness and civility belong to the ethics of shopping. A friend who has spent many years abroad declares that in America women on both sides the counter fail in so slight a thing as saying "good-morning," or "good-afternoon," as an interchange of courtesy. She, for her part, never fails to say "good-morning" or "good-afternoon" to the person who waits upon her.

When articles are to be returned or exchanged the transaction must be attended to without delay. This, too, belongs to the ethics of shopping.

FOR YOU AND FOR ME!

There's a present for you and a present for me,
That Santa Claus hung on this wonderful tree.

The Buffet Luncheon

A pleasant way of entertaining a larger number of friends than can be easily seated at an ordinary table is to serve them from the sideboard as they sit in groups, stand informally about a room or are placed at small tables. The latter method is the most comfortable. A little variety may be afforded if this be adopted by selecting a hostess for each table, usually an intimate friend or relative who makes herself responsible for the pleasure of the guests under her care. These subhostesses may change places during a luncheon, moving from table to table, or the guests themselves may be changed so that they meet the separate hostesses in turn. The menu for a buffet luncheon may be simple or elaborate at the discretion of the giver of the feast. Four courses are fully sufficient, and may consist of fruit, frappés, cold tongue or chicken with creamed potatoes and peas and any selected dessert. Coffee should be served with the dessert. Bouillon, broiled chops or chicken, lettuce salad and ice-cream furnish a very enjoyable repast. The menu may be infinitely varied. Sandwiches or rolls should be served.

THE WHITE DAYS OF WINTER

THE white days of winter, darling,
When softly the snowflakes fall
Till a royal garment of ermine
Folds tenderly over all—
Field and hillock and valley
Hushed in the sweetest sleep,
For the snow comes down from our Father,
His loving charge to keep.

Under the snow-robe, darling,
There is wonderful brooding heat,
That is taking care of the daisies
And saving the next year's wheat;
And we'd have no flowers, dearest,
When the Spring's green days come back,
If the white days did not bring us
The feathery flakes in their track.

And the golden days, my darling,
The days of lily and rose
And the scarlet days of the maple,
All follow the path of the snows;
For the year goes round, my darling,
With the sunbeam and the shower,
And our Father's watch is over
Its every passing hour.

Our little home, my darling—
Oh, whatever wind may blow,
The south with its quiver of sunbeams,
The north with its quiver of snow—
Our little home, my dearest,
Is under the dear Lord's care,
And we fear no ill nor sorrow,
Lovingly sheltered there.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

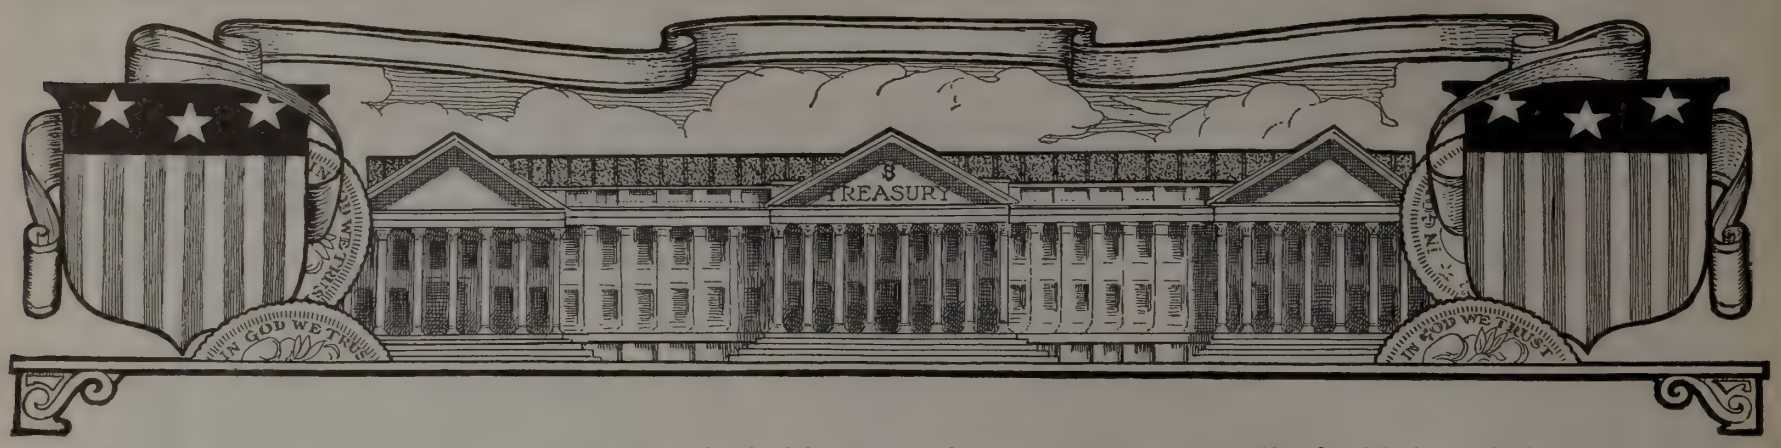
A GREAT NATIONAL PROTEST



NOTHING that has happened in years has touched the American heart more deeply and painfully than the removal of the time-honored motto from the national coinage. Many hundreds of letters on the subject have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and they are still coming, in apparently undimished volume. The overwhelming majority demand the restoration of the motto. These letters, which come from every State and are a sure index of the general feeling throughout the nation, if published in full, would fill almost an entire issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We give a number of them in these two pages:

Show the World Where We Stand

Every effort should be made to have the motto restored to our coins. It has always impressed me as being a beautiful and yet positive way of showing the world just where and how we stand in our relation to Him "whose we are and whom we serve."

Brooklyn, N. Y. MRS. JAMES MITCHELL.

Restore the Motto!

We trust that this motto may be restored on the coin, and there remain.

Brooklyn, N. Y. MRS. WM. CARROLL.

This Is "God's Country"

As this is God's beloved country, the words should certainly be retained along with the American eagle.

Philadelphia, Pa. ELBRIDGE G. STOUT.

The Nation Should Trust in God

I am sorry that the motto "In God We Trust," has been left off of our coins. It inspired us to know that we, as a nation, trusted in God, and were not ashamed to admit it. May we continue to trust in God as a little child would trust its mother. "Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah there is everlasting strength." Isa. 26: 4. MRS. MINNA O. BRAND.

Eureka Springs, Ark.

Removing the Solid Foundation

It caused us sorrow when we observed on the new coins, the absence of the revered and time-honored motto. To eliminate this would seem like removing the solid foundation upon which America stands and has stood for years. It would seem like ignoring the sacrifices made by the Pilgrim Fathers; the victories of the American Revolution and the triumph of faith in God manifested by Lincoln, when after prayer, with the stroke of his pen, 3,000,000 slaves were set free.

MRS. L. H. KENNEY,
AMELIA STEWART,
T. R. S. CRAIG,
M. E. MCKAIG, Philadelphia.

Wilmington. EARL B. CRAIG, M.D.

God the Nation's Strength

The motto, "In God We Trust," should never be dropped from our coins. Who but God has been our strength and stay and made us the nation we are to-day? Praise and honor to his holy name.

Washington, D. C. S. A. D. H.

Like the Atheism of France in 1790

The dropping from our coins of the motto "In God We Trust," appeals to every Christian who has a spark of patriotism left in his heart. No Christian whose forefathers had a hand in helping to found this God-given country, and who, in fleeing from home and native land to avoid persecution, left all that they held dear to find a home where they could worship God in peace and security, can possibly object to the stamping of that dear name and motto, for which their fathers suffered so much. I never dreamed that President Roosevelt would sanction such a want of reverence. It seems too much like the first step toward ruin, and not far removed from the act of France in the revolution of 1790, when they decreed that God did not exist. N. W. MERRILL.

Springfield, Mass.

"God Forbid!"

God forbid that they change the motto on our coin! N. W. WINSTON.

Louisa, Va.

Which Side Wants the Motto?

There are only two great leaders in this world, Christ and the devil. They are the very opposite in almost everything. Which of these desires the motto on our coins to remain, and which one wants it erased? I think the party of Christ wants it to remain, while the other party would like to see it forever erased from every coin, and the image and knowledge of Jesus erased from every heart. REV. W. T. LONE.

Statesville, N. C.

Are We Forgetting God?

I am decidedly in favor of replacing the motto "In God We Trust" on our national coin. It seems to me that there is a general tendency to go away from God in nearly everything now.

Edmunds, N. D. MRS. M. E. CRAVATH.

Cling to the Motto

If we, as a Christian nation, allow the removal of our motto, "In God We Trust," from our coins on account of ridicule and irreverence, we disown God and give permission also to remove the date for the same cause. Can our nation afford to do this?

Cling to our motto, "In God We Trust,"
This for our nation surely is just.
God is our leader, he is our Guide,
Do not insult and set him aside.

Pittsford, Mich. B. L. TURNER.

Put Back the Motto

Shall we not have the motto still,
These words, "In God We Trust,"
Upon our gold and silver coins?
Yes, keep it there we must.

Our God has fought our battles well,
Kept us through good and ill;
Has given us peace and plenty, too;
Can we not trust him still?

Are we a Christian nation yet,
And fear the truth to own?
"In God We Trust," oh, let that fact
In every land be known.

Put back the motto on our coin,
And let us keep it there;
And as a nation, by our deeds,
Its truthfulness declare.

Walton, N. H. A. R. P.

We Need God's Help Always

I am distressed that our good President should remove our ancient landmark. We are a Christian nation, but there is much to alarm us. Violence and suicides reign. In a single issue of the Ledger, six suicides were reported. There is so much lawlessness and ungodliness that we need all the help and the recognition of our God to sustain us in our perils.

Germantown, Pa. MRS. E. B. STARK.

A Dangerous Step

We should keep the sacred motto, "In God We Trust," on all our national coinage, because it is a sermon in itself and shows to the world that we as a nation believe in one God and recognize him in our very commercial life. I hope and trust the inscription will be replaced. Many things that are dangerous we are doing as a people, among them ruling the holy Bible out of our public schools in so many cities. J. M. STONER.

Asheville, N. C.

Deprecated by All Good Men

I join with all good men in deprecating this sad departure from the God-honoring ways of the wise men of other days. The word still remains true, "Them that honor me I will honor, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed." I. Sam. 2: 30.

New York. JOSEPH B. MAXFIELD.

Restore the Words

"In God We Trust." Most woful day
When ceases thus our land to pray.
Restore the words you took away
From off our coins—brook no delay.
No matter what the scoffers say,
"In God We Trust"—no better way.

Then lift us high, don't drag us down,
And with the stars let's wear the crown!
"In God We Trust." let's pass it on,
Each time we trade with God's own coin,
Let's raise the standard to the throne,
On coin, in life, the Lord to own!

Roanoke, Va. THEODORE LOW.

A Sad Mistake

I think it is a sad mistake to remove the motto. With the widespread desecration of the Sabbath, the motto gone from our coins, the name of Jesus taken from the song-books at Christmas, where are we drifting? When I heard that the words "In God We Trust" were left off the new coins, it seemed as though a star had fallen from the flag.

Shall we now cease to trust him? Are we ashamed? It is written: "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

Millington, Md. MARY E. BRYAN.

Will the Bible be Dropped Next?

We are much opposed to the dropping of the motto "In God We Trust." Man must and ever will repose his trust in something; it may be wealth, influence, an idol, himself. No one of these can be trusted. "Trust ye in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." The dropping of the motto must have its root very near the borders of atheism; the next step may be the dropping of the Bible, as in the time of the French Revolution.

Shinnston, W. Va. E. M. SAPP.

Do We Trust in God Any More?

Some one said to me the other day, "I guess they are going to leave it off because we don't trust in God any more." If that is not "making light of the matter" and leaving us in bad shape for the future, if many people reason that way, I am much mistaken. I am one of those who still "Trust in God," whether the motto be on or off of our coins. I believe, too, for the welfare of coming generations, we cannot keep the solemn words too conspicuously in the sight of our people. C. S.

Canton, O.

A "Great Blunder"

The inscription was a natural outcome of our faith, and its removal is a probably undesigned slap in the face to the predicted programme of the Gospel. If the allegation of "bad taste" be right, the prophet was surely wrong when he declared that the sacred inscription on the high priest's mitre, "Holiness unto the Lord," should eventually find place on the "bells of the horses." God commanded the ancients to write the sacred verities of their faith upon the posts of their houses, and afterward, by the mouth of Isaiah, denounced those who showed their divided allegiance in setting up their memorial "behind the doors," where they could not be seen. A nation's faith needs no protection from the jests of a few fools. Only a great man could be capable of so great a blunder. (REV.) WM. POWICK.

Allentown, Pa.

Let the Motto Stand

The motto is an expression of honor, gratitude and love from the American nation to the God who made them free. The God of love wants public expression from his people, that the world may see and profit by it, and he honors any opportunity taken to acknowledge him.

Can this nation afford to cast aside so far-reaching an opportunity as is given by the motto on the coins, to honor the God who has so abundantly blessed them? Let the beautiful words stand forth on gold and silver, and keep ever before our eyes the thought of him who gave us liberty.

Brooklyn, N. Y. ADA F. BUTTON.

Congress Should Restore It

Congress should restore the motto on our national coins, as the motto of all our basic laws. Historians of future centuries would then know, beyond doubt, that these coins represented a Christian nation, which trusted in God, notwithstanding the sceptic's opinion. F. S. CASHION.

Hennessey, Okla.

A Menace to Our Institutions

The proposition to remove the motto is not American, and it should be retained as a landmark of our beloved country. The war upon the Bible, the recent action of the school board in New York to exclude the name of Christ from the books of song, and the removal of our national motto from our coins; all should be regarded as a menace to our government and its institutions. REV. D. BANCROFT.

Sperry, Ia.

How an Immigrant Views It

When I first came to this country and noticed the motto on the first dollar I received my heart was moved and I felt more warmly toward the American government. The motto is a Christian herald to all nations.

Let all the people together join
And keep the motto on the coin.

Blackinton, Mass. JOHN OWEN.

It Expresses the Nation's Faith

It is the non-sectarian motto, not of the few, but of the many, and being such, should not have been removed from the coinage without popular approval. A motto expressive of patriotism has no more right upon our coins than one expressive of the faith without which a nation would presently find itself in the dust. Old Glory is not too good for every-day use, neither is the grand old motto which has so long publicly expressed the highest faith of the great American people.

Rutland, Vt. CHARLES B. THOMPSON.

LET CONGRESS RESTORE THE MOTTO

A VOICE FROM THE UNITED STATES TREASURY

WHEN we consider the trying times and hard conditions which our brave, true, noble men and women endured in establishing this Republic, we realize that they could not have succeeded had they not been imbued with, and led by, an unfailing faith in God. The Bible and God are the two great foundation stones on which they erected our Temple of Liberty. Therefore, it is our duty to them and to ourselves to have that motto, "In God We Trust," restored. It should be on all the money of our Republic.

Salina, Kan. G. W. WALKER.

They Stand for Our Highest Ideal

Should Be Instantly Replaced

As an American citizen, I believe the motto "In God We Trust" should be instantly restored to its time-honored place on our national coins. While absolutely non-sectarian, it expresses the deep, unwavering faith of the vast mass of our people. Its removal shocks the moral sense of the nation, and nothing less than its prompt and full restoration will satisfy the conscience of this Christian land.

Dishonoring God

Nations are honored or dishonored, as they honor or dishonor God. "Blessed is that nation whose God is the Lord." I feel that a great many of our blessings, as a nation, are due to this public testimony of trust in God. MRS. HARRY WATKIN.

East Liverpool, O.

Don't Haul Down the Banner

The removal of the motto shows an evidence of weakness and a catering to the adversary on the part of the authorities in power. So long as we claim to be a Christian nation, Christian mottoes should dominate its citizens. When a professedly Christian nation obliterates its Christian motto, it permits, or licenses, the banner of truth to be hauled down and trampled under the feet of men. E. FRANCIS.

Austin, Ill.

Is It Blasphemy?

The government of the United States has for many years proclaimed to the world that "In God We Trust," but now she backs down; takes it all back; we trust in God no longer. If that is not blasphemy, what is it? E. R. REED.

Madison, Wis.

Keep the Banner Flying

It is true, this sublime sentiment has often been made the subject of blasphemous insult; but so has our flag! We do not ignore Christ because he has been scourged and spit upon. We do not haul down the Stars and Stripes because they have at times been trampled under brutal feet. Let us nail our colors to the mast-head and go on to either defeat or victory with our banners flying, and with our trust in the living God emblazoned upon our coinage! ELIZABETH A. REED.

An Event of Ill Omen

Are we grown so arrogant and independent that we need no longer proclaim to all nations our trust in God? I predict our troubles have not begun, if we do not have the motto replaced. MRS. E. M. GAUSE.

A Nation's Indignation Aroused

The plan to eliminate "In God We Trust" from our national coinage has aroused the indignation it justly deserves.

Hattiesburg, Miss. HOUSTON BRELAND.

A Backward Step

The elimination of the motto is a backward step. This step is on a par with the un-American, illogical policy of banishing the Bible and its teachings from the public schools of New York and Ohio.

Toledo, O. F. J. OBLINGER.

A Presbyterian Pastor's Protest

I consider this a time to register my protest as it pertains to the unexpected action taken by our President. It only proves the saying correct which declares, "All great men are not always wise." We, as citizens of the Republic, who love that sacred sentence, ought not to be robbed of our right use of it, because of the other fellow's abuse of it. We would not like to see this landmark removed and none put in its place. (REV.) H. W. EWART.

Sumner, Ia.

A Strong Protest Urged

From friends who have expressed their opinions concerning the removal of the motto, I have not heard a dissenting voice. I feel with them that it should be retained, especially on our silver coins, as they are most in circulation. Let us hope that a strong protest on the part of our people may assure the continued imprint of a sentiment which acknowledges faith in the Almighty. JULIA BILLINGS.

Ought to Be Restored

The reason given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the words "In God We Trust" being placed upon the coinage ought to hold for all time. I sincerely hope that the words "In God We Trust" may be restored to the coinage.

Berlin, Wis. ELLEN J. SALISBURY.

A Blow at Christian Sentiment

The motto has adorned our coin for many years; and if left off now, the effect will certainly not aid or increase Christian sentiment, but rather the reverse. We should trust God in all things; why then is the motto out of place on our coins when we claim to be a Christian nation?

Oak Ridge, N. J. W. C. OLIVER.

A True American's Protest

I am now in the eighty-first year of my age. My forefathers (on my father's side), were among the Pilgrims of Plymouth, and my grandfather was a soldier of the Revolution. My ancestors, paternal and maternal, took part in the early affairs of this God-blessed country.

"In God We Trust" is the basic expression of our faith and trust as a free and united people. David, "the sweet singer of Israel," called upon his people to trust in God and sing his praise for their deliverance from bondage. Our Key-written song, "The Star-Spangled Banner," gives the theme for our praise and the source of our deliverance. Our silver and gold, with the motto indelibly stamped thereon, circulate, and our flag floats, in and over "the isles of the sea." From these the Cubans and Filipinos may learn our mission and profit by our example. "The isles shall wait for his law." Isa. 42: 4.

Shall we not profit by the history of nations in the past and learn wisdom? Read I. Sam. 8: 7.

When the order was given to strike "In God We Trust" from our coin, it was the worst strike ever ordered in the history of our country. Congress should at once order a halt and a restoration of the motto.

Port Republic, Va. JOHN W. PALMER.

MINISTERS BUILD A TABERNACLE

The Eleven Pastors who Built the Kansas City Tabernacle

AT a meeting of the ministers of the churches of the Christian denomination in Kansas City, Mo., City Evangelist Frank L. Bowen outlined the need of a Gospel Tabernacle in a certain section of that city. The lot had already been donated, but means to build the church were not yet available. After considering the need and the situation generally, all the pastors present agreed with Mr. Bowen that, by rolling up their sleeves and going at the carpenter work themselves, they could erect a suitable building. Accordingly, the next meeting day of the association was designated as "Building Day." Each pastor equipped himself with the tools which he believed he could handle best.

With the aid of one carpenter, and a layman who offered his services, the entire tabernacle was erected by the eleven stout-armed pastors. At the time appointed all hands were on the ground with saws, hammers, levels and all other necessary equipment. The lumber had been ordered in the meantime and was already there. Some neighbors who did not know for what purpose the building was being erected, and who did not suspect that the workmen were preachers, went to the site soon after the work had started to make inquiry about it. It is a fine residence neighborhood, and they though it might be for a dance hall. Their fears, however were soon allayed, and they wished the project all possible success. The women of the neighborhood served dinner, and when the tabernacle was otherwise completed, washed the windows.

The accompanying photograph was made two hours after the work began. The names of the preachers in the group are: Revs. Frank L. Bowen, L. S. Cupp, J. D. Thompson, T. A. Abbott, W. F. Richardson, S. W. Nay, Barclay Meador, James Sharratt, W. C. Thomas, L. P. Kopp, D. Y. Donaldson.

Would Keep the Motto Off

As Paul declared that the love of money is the root of all evil, it seems to me that placing the inscription "In God We Trust" upon our coins is nothing short of sacrilege. I have always looked upon it with disgust, and I am glad that it has not been inscribed on our new coins. AMOS S. YOUNG.

Comus, Md.

The Motto Not in Good Taste

The motto has always seemed to my views not in good taste. We pass all our negotiable paper, "greenbacks," clearing-house certificates, etc., without this "In God We Trust." Is it not as necessary as on coin? HUGH HAMILTON.

Hamsburg, Pa.

Wants the Motto Off

I think the President's action conforms to the spirit of modern times. The trend of thought is away from the State mixing in religious affairs. The inscription is useful to few people as a reminder that there is a Deity, because the coins are seldom examined. I believe in a complete separation of religion and politics.

Medina, N. Y. NEWELL B. THATCHER.

He Agrees with the President

I am fully in accord with the President's views to eliminate the "In God We Trust" motto from the coinage. Probably a large majority of the people of this country have no trust in God at all, and they trust in themselves more than in any one else. What most of the people are after is wealth and worldly pleasure.

CHAPTER V

A Prejudiced Guide

"IF you would like to drive out into the country to-day, to see some of the people, the horse and buggy are at your disposal, and, as you are unfamiliar with the road, I think you might be able to persuade Hollis to act as guide," suggested Mr. Hayward one bright morning as the family arose from the breakfast-table.

"Indeed, I should be glad to go, as I can become so much better acquainted with the people when I meet them in their own homes. I am particularly anxious to visit the Lawrences and the Alisons. As for the guide"—turning toward Hollis—"I would be more than glad to have one. Will you be able to go with me, Miss Hollis?"

"I shall be delighted to do so," the girl replied, a flush of pleasure rising to her cheeks. "I was longing for a drive, as the morning is too beautiful to spend in the house. How soon do you wish to start?"

"It is for you to set the time, to suit your own convenience, and the convenience of the people we are going to visit. It does not do to intrude too early upon a housekeeper's work."

"There is no danger of doing that when visiting the Lawrences, as they get up ridiculously early, and no doubt have finished all of their work by this time. I stayed all night there several times, and they never failed to send me to bed before I was sleepy, and to make me eat breakfast before I was awake, so I know their ways by sad experience. It is impossible to intrude there, for they have so many visitors that they never get a chance to pack their company manners away with moth-balls."

"They must be very hospitable people," observed the minister.

"They are," responded Mr. Hayward. "We always know where to send the extra ministers and Sunday School missionaries who stray into this region. The Lawrences keep open house all the year round for such people. It is quite convenient for the rest of us, who are not always situated so that we can entertain strangers at a moment's notice."

The minister mentally considered the large, well-furnished house and well-appointed table of his host, and wondered why it was ever inconvenient for a minister to be entertained there; but he wisely forbore any remarks or questions on the subject.

About the middle of the morning, Miss Hollis announced her readiness to start upon their drive, and a few minutes later the pair were upon their way.

It was a lovely morning in the early spring. The sky was an intense blue, unflecked with clouds; the air was warm, the breeze soft and inspiriting. The river danced and sparkled while the trees upon its banks bent over as if to admire their own reflections in its waters. Great fields of wheat and oats began to show the green shoots that gave promise of an early harvest. The whistle of redbirds, the song of mocking-birds and thrushes, the trill of wild canaries, filled the air with melody. It was a rare, sweet morning, and the soul of the young minister was filled with the delight of living in it.

Given all these surroundings, a spirited horse to drive, and a lively companion beside him, what more was to be asked? He found himself wishing that they had no destination, that they might simply go on riding together without interruption to their pleasant companionship, while the birds sang and the breezes whispered.

An old-fashioned, roomy farm-house, situated well back from the road, and surrounded by a grove of tall trees, caught Mr. Allan's eye, and he asked who were the occupants.

"That is where the Conovers live," Hollis replied.

"It was a rare, sweet morning——"

"Suppose we stop for a few minutes," suggested the minister.

"Oh, dear, no!" cried the girl. "It would never do. Mrs. Conover would think we had come intending to stay for dinner, and she would positively freeze us. Let me warn you never to go there without special invitation; when that is given, you will find everybody in their Sunday clothes, a dining-table spread with china and silver, and loaded with a regular Thanksgiving dinner. At other times——" A significant shrug of the shoulders finished the sentence, and left the minister feeling doubtful about the character of the Conovers, whose hospitality appeared to be of a variable type, according to Miss Hayward's classification.

The welcome they received when they reached the Lawrence homestead allowed no doubt of its heartiness. Mrs. Lawrence and her daughter came to meet them, before Mr. Allan had assisted Hollis from the buggy, and Mr. Lawrence came hurrying from the barn to greet his pastor. As soon as the words of welcome were uttered, the farmer began to unfasten the harness, saying:

"Of course you have come to stay all day. Indeed, we won't hear of anything else; so we'll give Dandy a drink and a few oats by way of entertainment," and he patted the horse's shining neck as he spoke. While the three women went to the house, the farmer and minister went away to the barn with the horse. Their conversation on general and social topics soon led to the church, whose interests were dear to both their hearts, and so absorbed did they become that they sat down upon a bench under the shade of the trees and talked until the bell warned them that dinner would be ready in half an hour.

"Why! why!" exclaimed the farmer, "my wife and Mabel will be pulling my hair for my thoughtless selfishness in keeping you out here all morning and giving them no chance to enjoy your visit. Come, let us go and make peace with them."

Mr. Allan looked about him in some surprise after he had seated himself in the cool parlor of the farmhouse. The furnishings of the room were not what he had expected to find in a country parlor.

The room was delightfully homelike. It had a cream-colored drop-ceiling with narrow gilt moulding, and pale-green tinted walls, and a carpet of deep moss-green. A handsome piano stood in one corner; a row of well-filled book-cases occupied a generous share of room; several choice engravings hung upon the walls, and the broad, cushioned window-seat and numerous easy-chairs invited to delightful rest.

"What a cool, restful room this is!" the young man exclaimed involuntarily.

"That is what every one says who comes into it," replied his host. "When we built our house, we planned it so as to take advantage of every bit of cool breeze, for—as you'll find—a Kansas summer is generous in the matter of warmth and sunshine. There is not another room in the whole country so cool as this on a sultry August day, as I trust you will discover for yourself hereafter."

The conversation then turned to books and music, in which all present took an equally interested share, proving to the delighted minister the education and refinement of these people among whom his lot had been cast. Thus the time passed until, with real regret, he discovered that half the afternoon was gone, and announced that he and Miss Hollis would have to leave at once if they were to call upon the Alisons that afternoon.

"What a charming family that is!" Mr. Allan exclaimed, as he and his companion rode along the quiet highway. "It is not often that one meets with so much culture and refinement so far from city influences as this."

"Yes," Hollis replied rather grudgingly, "the Lawrences are quite well-educated—and they are never backward about displaying their attainments. They are not at all superior to some others in our church, but they aspire to the leadership in everything, and leave no stone unturned to acquire it. Witness our very flattering reception and entertainment to-day. They are excessively friendly to one's face, but it's 'out of sight, out of mind,' with the Lawrences. Don't think I intend to be disagreeable in saying so," she added hastily, as she noted disapproval upon the face of her companion. "I only want to give you friendly warning—as your guide, you know—to save you from future disappointments."

Then with ready skill she turned the conversation to a discussion of things to be seen by the way, giving such racy descriptions of places and people that the young minister forgot the unpleasant feeling caused by her previous "warning," and gave himself up to the charm of her companionship.

During the years spent in college and seminary, Edgar Allan had been so absorbed in his studies that he had given very little time to society beyond the customary round of college receptions and entertainments. His educational course had omitted the "optional" of yearly flirtations and love affairs, which rarely ever fails to be "elected" by college students of both sexes, but for which no "degree" is given on their diplomas. He had graduated "heart-whole and fancy free," with no thought for anything except the work in which he hoped to spend his life. This was in one sense unfortunate for the young minister, as he went forth to his chosen calling without warning of the dangers in his path, and without any means of defense when confronted by the perplexing circumstances and snares of his new life. The daily companionship with a bright and pretty girl was rapidly working its natural effect upon this unsophisticated young man, causing him to form prejudices against people whom she disliked.

For these reasons, when the young minister sat in his room that evening and reviewed the events of the day, all unconsciously to himself there lingered in his mind a feeling of aversion for the unvisited Conovers, of distrust for the hospitable Lawrences, and of aggression against the blunt, plain-spoken Alisons; and he knew not that these feelings had been inspired by the jealousies and prejudices of the girl who had been his "guide" during his day's excursion.

CHAPTER VI

Discord in the Choir

THERE is no spot in the structure of a church so tender as the choir—a fact which most ministers know to their sorrow. Even the old colored minister voiced his experience when he said: "When de debbil goes to chu'ch, he mos' always takes a seat in de choiah."

In the Hawthorne church, the choir had been a sore spot from time immemorial, so that the disease had become chronic and a cure seemed impossible.

In consideration of the large amount of money spent upon her musical education, Hollis Hayward and her circle of friends considered that she was the only proper person in the congregation to direct and lead that part of the church service, not perceiving the fact, obvious to unbiased critics, that her musical ability was as limited as her education had been expensive. Whenever her contingent became strong enough, she was given the positions of organist and musical director, two offices which she wielded so despotically that she soon found herself left without a choir, and obliged by popular opinion to resign the place. As a consequence, her opposition to whomsoever followed her was as vigorous as her leadership had been, so that—as Glenn Fraser expressed it—"It made very little difference who occupied the church-organ stool, somebody was always trying to upset it," a state of affairs which at times rendered musical life in the Hawthorne church rather strenuous. During the incumbency of the former pastor the choir had gone to pieces under Hollis' administration, and a volunteer choir with a really incompetent organist had taken its place. The musical part of the church service was very uncertain, the minister being obliged to select his hymns with careful consideration of the music which was familiar to the choir.

The first few Sundays after Mr. Allan took charge of the church, he left the selection of music to the choir, so that he did not realize how limited was the ability of his organist.

Hollis Hayward bided her time with scarcely repressed impatience, knowing that if she could but gain the desired hold upon the susceptible young minister's confidence, she would secure his support in her determination to regain the coveted position of leader of the choir.

Mabel Lawrence was a good musician, and for a while had been one of Hollis' most powerful rivals; but the periodical attacks of Hollis' party had so disgusted the girl that she positively refused to be elected organist under any circumstances whatsoever. While she deplored the serious lack of a good leader in this important branch of church service, she could not endure to be the cause of factional contests, and so she did not take any part in the choir.

The afternoon which Mr. Allan and Hollis had spent at the Lawrence home, in answer to Mr. Allan's request for music Mabel had shown a skill which surprised and delighted the young minister, whose musical taste was a cultivated one, a fact which was as apparent as it was disagreeable to Miss Hollis.

The Sunday after that visit, when the Haywards were sitting at the dinner-table, Mr. Allan said: "Miss Hollis, why do not you and Miss Lawrence take part in the choir service? You are both so capable that you might make that part of the service both delightful and helpful to us all. Is it because you are both so timid, or are you wilfully hiding your lights under a bushel?"

The girl's face flushed with delight over this implied invitation, but her voice was cool and steady as she answered: "We have both served our apprenticeship in that position, and have become utterly wearied by the half-heartedness of the choir."

"You should not 'weary in well-doing' when you are so capable and so much needed," replied the guileless minister.

"That's right. Make her repent of the error of her ways," said Mr. Hayward in his usual hearty fashion. "After all the money we have spent on Hollis' musical education, it does seem senseless for her to yield the place to such incompetent musicians as Amy Conover and Grace Alison. As for Mabel Lawrence, she does remarkably well for one who has received so little instruction as she has had. She might become a fine musician if she would take lessons from some good teacher."

"She must have great natural ability, then, for she plays beautifully, and has a fine, smooth voice," replied Mr. Allan.

No answer was made to this remark, and the subject was dropped for the time. To be continued

Secretary Root's Commendation

AT the annual meeting of the American Red Cross, held in Washington lately, Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary of State, delivered an address reviewing the work of the organization throughout the year. In the course of his remarks he paid a tribute to the readers of The Christian Herald for the generous aid they rendered during the great Chinese famine. He said:

I wish to make special acknowledgment to the Red Cross Society of the work which has been done in response to the President's proclamation, issued a year ago this month, in regard to the famine in China. He called then upon the people of the United States to answer to the old instinct of friendliness and kindness for the people of China in alleviating the terrible sufferings caused by the famine throughout a region possessing a population of some ten millions of lives.

The answer to that call was most gratifying. I do not think it could have been, had there not been some recognized society possessing the confidence of the people to receive and administer the funds and the supplies of the kind that were furnished.

Through the extraordinary energy and capacity of Mr. Klopsch, Editor of The Christian Herald, a very large amount of money was collected, and, through the confidence of the people in the Red Cross organization, it was put into their hands, and, I believe, was applied with great fidelity and success. Money and supplies amounting to over half a million dollars were directly applied to the relief of the suffering of China in the famine-stricken region.

I think this, with other similar instances, illustrates a very important field of usefulness for the Red Cross Society, which is better calculated to appeal to the people of the United States than its service in time of war. . . . You are doing a work indispensable toward the education of mankind in the life that exemplifies the spirit of humanity and the spirit of Christianity, rather than the life that is of the beast, bestial; which marks the cruelty of ancient days, rather than the divine compassion of the coming of our Lord.

The Incarnation

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THERE is a marked difference between the subject matter of the Gospel of John and that of the other three evangelists. Matthew, who represents Christ as the King, commences with his genealogy; Mark, who speaks of him as the Servant and the Sacrifice, passes over this, as well as the events of his birth, and, after a short account of John the Baptist, tells of his temptation and ministry; Luke, who speaks of him as the Man, gives fuller details of his birth than any of the others; while John, to whom it was committed to tell of Jesus as God, begins far back in the past eternity of God, "In the beginning was the Word." "The Word"—the expression of God, the translation of God into human thought and human language, bringing God within reach of man, so that in Jesus man could see God.

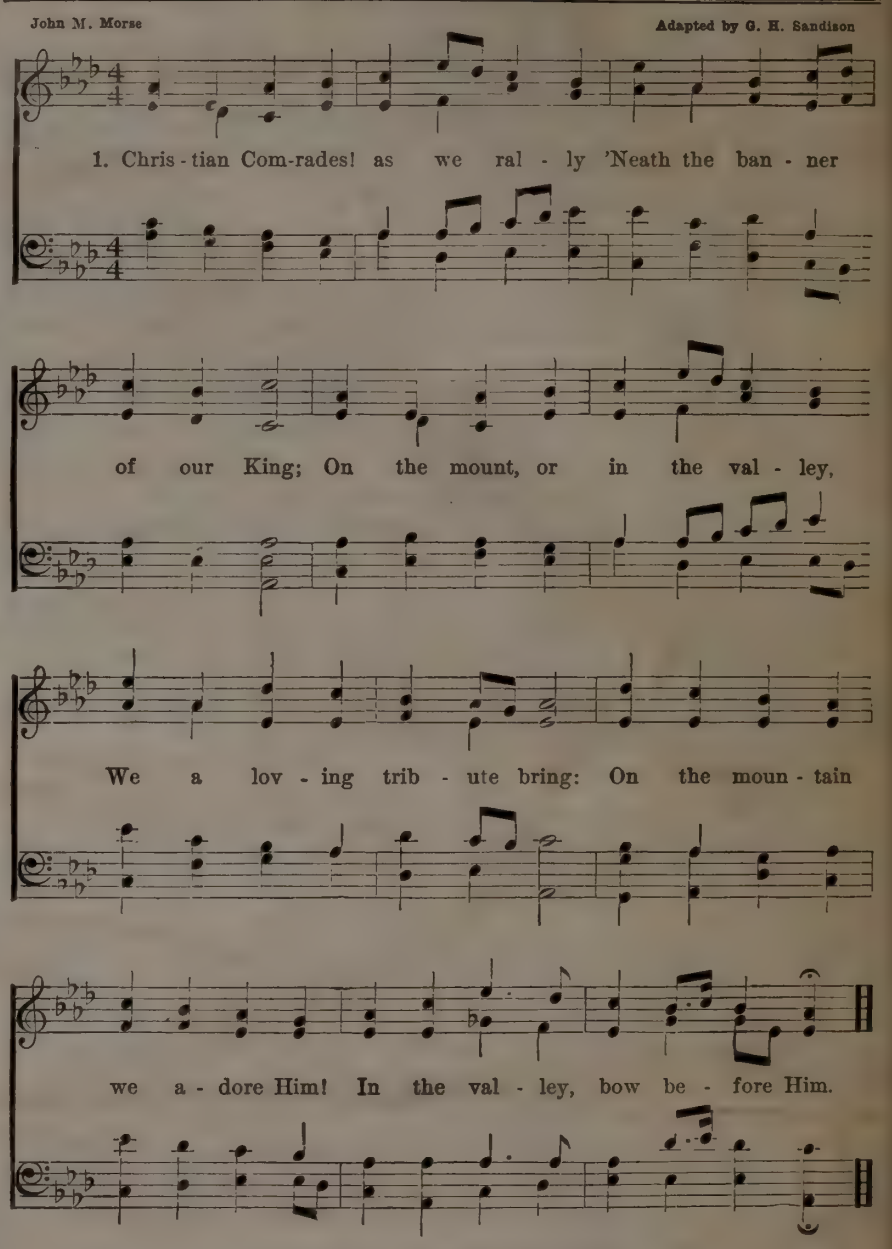
Mr. Henry Drummond, in his book, Natural Law in the Spiritual World, very beautifully shows how in nature, a lower kingdom cannot cross the boundary which divides it from a higher, until the higher kingdom has come down to it. Thus, the mineral, cannot imbue itself with the life of the vegetable, but the vegetable can reach down into the mineral world, and absorb into itself the substance of the soil in which it is planted, by bridging the gulf which separates, and by that absorption it can lift the dead mineral into a kingdom of life. Just so did God reach down into our human nature, our animal life—"the Word was made flesh." "Forasmuch . . . as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil." (Heb. 2: 14.)

"In Him was Life." "I am the Resurrection and the Life," and this for soul and body. "With thee is the fountain of life" (Ps. 36 : 9). Yet are not many seeking to obtain spiritual life from their own efforts, or, when they have it, to increase it by some struggling of their own, instead of going straight to the Fountain? When Jesus dawns upon us, all darkness disappears; he becomes the Solution of every problem, the Answer to every question, the Resource in every perplexity. Every thinking mind which has not Jesus for its Light is involved in a complication of perplexities about men and things, but when we once for all accept him to throw light on every question, he lifts us up into the world of his thoughts, and then things we could not understand while we were on a level with them become quite clear as we see them from above, from God's level. "In thy light shall we see light" (Ps. 36 : 9). Again, Jesus is the Light which reveals us to ourselves. The Samaritan woman had no ground of self-righteousness to stand upon after she had met with Jesus; she said, "Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did"—she knew herself only in knowing him.

"And the light shineth in darkness." Jesus comes down to the sinner, the Son of God comes down into the world. "And the darkness apprehended it not" (R.V.). But there was one who apprehended Jesus: "a man sent from God, whose name was John." It would be a grand thing if every preacher of the Gospel were, in very deed, a man or a woman "sent from God." To come with God's authority is to come with God's power, and this was manifest enough in John's preaching. But John came, not to be a light, but to be a witness, to point others to him who is the Light. Only of Jesus can it be said, "That was the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Thank God, here is a declaration that Jesus lighteth every man; that some way or other, by some means or other, or directly by the Holy Ghost, every man who comes into the world has some light from God.

Christ Our King

John M. Morse — Adapted by G. H. Sandison



1. Chris-tian Com-rades! as we ral-ly 'Neath the ban-ner of our King; On the mount, or in the val-ley,
We a lov-ing trib-ute bring: On the moun-tain
we a-dore Him! In the val-ley, bow be-fore Him.

COPYRIGHT, 1907, BY THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO., NEW YORK.

2 High o'er earthly thrones, we hail Him
King of kings and Lord of all!
Enemies that would assail Him,
Must at last before Him fall.
Perish thoughts and deeds unholy!
Christ our King, is meek and lowly.

3 Christ our King! His reign is glorious!
We will heed His gracious call.
In His ranks we march victorious,
We will triumph over all.
Christ our King! enthroned in glory,
Oh, the wondrous, wondrous story!

4 Coming from the highest heaven,
Coming to a world in sin,
Christ our King, all pow'r was given,
That He might the wayward win.
Christ the mighty, Christ the lowly,
Came to make His children holy.

5 Who on earth should be more joyous
Than the children of a King?
Freed from all that can destroy us,
Loud let hallelujahs ring!
Christ our King, shall reign forever!
Naught from Him our souls can sever.

SECRET PRAYER*

FROM Christ as from no other Being that ever trod this earth do we get authoritative ideas about prayer. He who came from God could say with certainty whether God would hear prayer, whether he wished his creatures to approach him, and whether they should come in a general worship, or as individuals. The question was really a practical one, because the more reverent a man was, the less he might be inclined to think that the Almighty Maker of heaven and earth would listen to one so insignificant as he. There were, besides, forms of prayer in use which some recited parrot-fashion at fixed hours of the day. Were these acceptable? Men might be seen, too, standing conspicuously on the corners of the streets uttering their prayers as if to call attention to their devotions. It was not to a prayerless people that Christ spoke.

His words were full of significance. They are addressed to the man who is seeking something from God. The man on the street corner was seeking something from men. But this man desires to be alone with God, and he enters a private room and shuts the door. He is to remember that God knows the things he has need of before the prayer is offered, therefore he is not to use frequent repetitions, like a child trying to tease a reluctant parent into granting a request. Anything showy or eloquent in such circumstances would be out of place. The plain, simple statement of need is all that is suitable, and here, as in other discourses, Christ intimates that God listens. He reserves the right of granting or withholding, as the faithful man would wish him to do. For who are we that we should presume to dictate to God? We have no right to take some promise from his Word and, as if it was a banker's check, present it and demand that he make good. That we do go to him with our requests at all is not to be regarded as a demand, but as a submissive expression of our dependence on him for every good. We are encouraged to pray and encouraged to expect answers to our prayers, but they ought always to be made in reverent recognition of his wisdom and love.

We glean also from his words and from the model prayer that has come to be known as "the Lord's Prayer," that our prayers should not be limited to our personal needs. The desire for the extension of Christ's kingdom, for the submission of the world to his will, and that his name may be honored, are all part of legitimate prayer. Besides this, there is the idea of communion, which brings to every sincere worshiper enlightenment.
